The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], and therefore, in his absence, withhold my vote.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as on the previous vote of my general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and withhold my vote.

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], and withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], and, in his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I will inquire whether the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed he has not.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Then I withhold my vote, having a pair with that Senator.

Mr. DU PONT. I again announce my pair with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I do not know that he would consider it applicable to this matter, but still I transfer the pair to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON. I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], and vote "yea."

While I am on my feet I desire to announce the necessary absence of the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] on account of illness. He is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

Mr. ROBINSON. I am requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], and to state that he is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT].

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to repeat the announcement of the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan], who is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I wish this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS], and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT].

Mr. WILLIAMS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (after having voted in the affirmative). I did not note in the recapitulation of the vote whether the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] had voted. I desire to inquire whether he has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed he has not voted.

Mr. WALSH. I have a pair with that Senator, and am therefore obliged to withdraw my vote. If permitted to vote, I should be glad to vote "yea."

Mr. BANKHEAD (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. In his absence, I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will break a quorum.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If that is true, then I will allow my vote to stand if it requires my vote to make a quorum.

Mr. WALSH. I feel impelled, then, to allow my vote to stand as well, inasmuch as it is necessary to make a quorum.

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 10, as follows:

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the next amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senate has voted that this amendment is in order. It has also voted upon the merits of the amendment. I made a point of order against this amendment, as I did in the case of the amendment on page 70 of the bill. The Chair ruled that the amendment on page 70 was subject to a point of order, and it went out of the bill upon my making the point of order.

I thought, of course, that in making these points I was well within the rules of the Senate. The Chair thought so, too; but the matter was submitted to the Senate, and the Senate decided otherwise. I also believed that in doing so I would receive the support of certain Senators who had told me that the bill was not only a vicious measure, but one that ought to be referred back to the committee, and that items of this sort never ought to appear in the bill.

If I have the right to do so, I should like to ask the Chair please to submit to the Senate the question of the point of order on the amendment on page 70 of the bill. I do not believe Louisiana ought to be discriminated against. I know she is suffering to-day from the effects of legislation that was passed by the Senate. If any part of the United States needs assistance and help, it is Louisiana. If we are going to give all that is asked by every State for every purpose, and if paternalism is to run mad in the Senate, I do not want to be the means of keeping from that suffering community any money that may be carried by an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment having been held by the Chair out of order, the present occupant of the chair declines to resubmit the question.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, after the bill gets into the Senate, of course, the amendment can be offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the next amendment.

The SECRETARY. The text of the bill after the amendment just agreed to reads as follows——

Mr. GORE. I wish at this juncture to say—and I call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the statement—that the Senator from Louisiana will offer a modified amendment when we have finished the consideration of committee amendments. I ask that the Secretary may read the amendment on page 73.

Mr. SMOOT. We are not yet through with this amendment. The whole amendment went over, and I desire to offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. GORE. The junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] desires to be present when this amendment is taken up. For that reason I ask that it be passed over for the present, and we will proceed with the other amendments in his absence.

Mr. SMOOT. Just so it is understood that we will go back to the amendment. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the committee amendment will be passed over.

The SECRETARY. The amendment on page 73, at the foot of the page, was passed over. It reads as follows:

To enable the Secretary to print and publish certain maps, heretofore prepared and now in the possession of the Department of Agriculture, and the reports accompanying the same, relating to the location, extent, and other features of kelp beds on the Pacific coast, $7,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it is manifest that this amendment would be subject to a point of order; but I am not going to make the point of order, because I think it would disarrange some matters that have been fixed up in the Senate in connection with this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not going to make a point of order on the amendment, although I believe it would lie.

I wish to say to the Senate that this is a dangerous proposition. The Committee on Appropriations appropriates hundreds of thousands of dollars for the Department of Agriculture for printing just such items as this. If we are going to come in, on another appropriation bill, and appropriate money for printing maps for the Agricultural Department, I do not know where it is going to end.

Evidently, however, there is no intention whatever of holding the bill to its rightful purposes; and if one section of the country is to have everything on earth it asks for, even to the protection of bumblebees, I am not going to object to this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the next amendment.

The SECRETARY. On the last page of the bill, the committee proposes to insert the following:

That the lump-sum appropriations now available or herein made for the field work of the Department of Agriculture, including appropriations for the administration of the national forests, for hog-cholera demonstrations, and for preventing spread of moths, shall be available for the purchase, maintenance, and repair of motor vehicles and motor boats necessary for the proper and efficient conduct of the work; said vehicles and boats shall be used exclusively for official service, and any other use shall constitute a misdemeanor punishable by fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment of not more than six months.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on a former occasion, and in calling attention to another amendment, I said that it was the most extraordinary amendment on the most extraordinary bill that I had ever seen submitted to the Senate. I think I ought to modify that statement now, and say that here is a still more extraordinary amendment. I do not know why the department wants motor boats to carry out the provisions for the administration of the national forests, or for hog-cholera demonstrations, or for preventing the spread of moths. The national forests are not on the ocean.

Mr. WARREN. Some of them are—in Alaska.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator behind me says some of them are in Alaska. I do not know how it may be as to them, but I suppose people can go overland in Alaska; can they not?

Mr. WARREN. They usually use boats.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Wyoming suggests that in Alaska they actually need boats to reach the forests, and perhaps that is so. That modifies my suggestion to that extent. I think we had better say "for the administration of the national forests in Alaska," however, if we are going to put in the provision at all.

Now, what about the hogs? Are they on the streams of the country or in the ocean?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator seems to be directing his remarks to me.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator corrected me in the other respect, and I thought the Senator might have some information on this point.

Mr. WARREN. The hog-cholera expert is here, and he can answer.

Mr. KENYON rose.

Mr. WARREN. I shall occupy only a moment.

As I understand the language of the amendment, it is for motor boats to use in the waters of Alaska and possibly in those of the State of Washington and part of Oregon; it is for vehicles to use in traversing the country in remedying hog cholera and other diseases that take men from one point to another.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; I yield cheerfully.

Mr. KENYON. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I wanted to call attention to a matter that concerns my own section of the country. There is not much in this bill that does.

Mr. WARREN. Perhaps the Senator is speaking of moths.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I take it that the same idea prevails there. The men in charge of the work go from orchard to orchard, or from place to place, with motor vehicles instead of horse-drawn vehicles.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have never seen a vehicle of that kind used for that purpose, but perhaps they are going to do it.

The amendment contains the words "and for preventing spread of moths." The thing that strikes me as rather peculiar in that connection is that the committee should have forgotten the boll weevil. They propose, in other words, to divert a portion of the appropriations for the administration of the national forests, for hog-cholera demonstrations, and for preventing the spread of moths to providing motor vehicles and motor boats necessary for the proper and efficient conduct of the work.

It occurs to me that it would be better legislation if we should provide these motor boats and motor vehicles, if they are needed, in a separate item. I apprehend, however, that there might be danger of the Senate not agreeing to that, because the Senate is rather prejudiced against this motor-vehicle business, as we have had occasion to know in connection with the District of Columbia appropriation bill and the legislative appropriation bill. It seems to have occurred to somebody, however, that on this general item they might work in part of the appropriations given for these other purposes, and in that way get these motor boats and motor vehicles, when they might fail to get them if a direct appropriation were offered for them.

It occurs to me that this is a bad form of legislation, and I want to say to those who framed this amendment, whoever they may be, that when they undertake to punish anybody for using these motor boats and motor vehicles otherwise than for strictly official service, they will fail to accomplish anything, because all these vehicles that we provide—and there are scores of them—are used for all kinds of purposes, and in all human probability always will be. I do not believe anybody will ever go to prison for using them for other than official purposes.

It is something like a matter that came to my attention a while ago, where a gentleman in public life was somewhat rebuked by his clerk on the ground that he was not strictly observing the franking privilege, because he was sending almost all of his correspondence under frank. His reply was: "Why, those letters may lead up to public business later on." [Laughter.] So, in this case, it may lead up to something, and that provision does not amount to anything.

I am only going to call attention to the matter, however, in a modest way. I have failed, as have some other Senators, to get any reasonable amendments to this bill. It has been ordained, I apprehend, that it shall pass pretty much as it has been written. I do want, however, to amend this amendment by taking a little of the boll-weevil appropriation and using it for repairing motor boats, too. I know of no reason why it should be taken from the appropriation for preventing the spread of moths.

Now, let me call attention to that matter. The moth appropriation has been slightly reduced from that of last year, but the boll-weevil appropriation was increased to some extent in the bill as it came from the House, and $150,000 more has been added to it here. We in the North think that these moths are destroying quite as much property as the boll weevil is, and that we ought to have a fair show.

At the proper time I intend to offer an amendment increasing the appropriation for the extermination of those destructive pests, the brown-tail and the gypsy moths. At the present time I content myself with moving to insert, after the words "spread of," in line 5, the words "the boll weevil and." With that amendment, whatever happens to it, I shall be content, so far as this amendment is concerned, to leave it to the Senate to put it in or vote it out, as the Senate sees fit.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I wish to suggest that the reason why the pending amendment has been proposed is that the legislative appropriation bill carries a provision, as I understand, which prohibits the use of any moneys for the purchase of automobiles or motor cycles without special authorization. In the field work in connection with the Forestry Service automobiles and motor cycles are indispensable for the proper conduct of the service, and in some instances motor boats, where there are rivers traversing the forests. This is the reason which has impelled the committee to offer the present amendment. It would be absolutely impossible to administer the service without these means of communication.

I send to the desk a letter from the department which, I think, in some measure will justify this "extraordinary" amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire the letter read?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

PURCHASE OF MOTOR VEHICLES.

On page 74, line 1, insert the following:

"That the lump-sum appropriations now available or herein made for the field work of the Department of Agriculture, including appropriations for the administration of the national forests, for hog-cholera demonstrations, and for preventing spread of moths, shall be available for the purchase, maintenance, and repair of motor vehicles and motor boats necessary for the proper and efficient conduct of the work; said vehicles and boats shall be used exclusively for official service, and any other use shall constitute a misdemeanor punishable by fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment of not more than six months."

This amendment was passed over at the suggestion of Senator KENYON.

The department requested that this provision be inserted in our appropriation bill, in view of the provision of section 5 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act, which prohibits the purchase, maintenance, or repair of motor-propelled vehicles without specific authority therefor. To properly carry out the work of the department it is absolutely necessary to have motor vehicles, especially in connection with the administration of the national forests, preventing the spread of the gipsy moth, etc. The department now has a number of motor vehicles in the field service, and it would seriously handicap the work unless the above provision is enacted into law.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from Oklahoma, but I should like to make a remark or two in reply to the inquiry of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. GORE. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. KENYON. I have been curious to understand this amendment, as to how motor vehicles and motor boats were to be used in the proper administration of hog-cholera remedies. The language seems to cover that.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. GORE. Of course there will be no necessity for motor boats in connection with the hog-cholera appropriation. I think they generally use motor cycles in connection with that service. When a farmer in one part of the county needs this serum the Government agents in such cases can go out on a motor cycle, or otherwise; that is the purpose which the committee had in view. The committee has since suggested that the clause relating to hog cholera might be eliminated from the amendment.

Mr. KENYON. I had supposed that while probably motor boats could not now be used in the hog-cholera work because of the absence of streams, yet when the river and harbor bill came in we might see the pertinency of this matter, as undoubtedly that bill will provide for the creation of streams and rivers where the Almighty has not provided them, and motor boats might be used there.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa further yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. GORE. Does the Senator understand that rivers and harbors are at all essential to navigation? [Laughter.]

Mr. KENYON. I do not know that they are; but the rivers and harbors bill seems to be essential to certain congressional districts. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. KENYON. I yield to the Senator from Missouri. He seems to have a quizzical expression on his face.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, this seems to be a very remarkable bill. It has broken all precedents. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa if he does not think that instead of having motor boats and motor vehicles, an antiquated if not obsolete form of transportation, we ought to adopt aeroplanes? Especially is that true when it comes to the question of capturing moths. How else will we catch them?

Mr. KENYON. The motor boat might be used in preventing the spread of moths, or in investigating the terrors of the snapping turtle, though I think that is not covered in this bill. Here are " motor vehicles." That will cover automobiles, I assume, which we have decided the District of Columbia Commissioners shall not have. They will be very useful in the hog-cholera work, and they will be useful to chase the festive cigarette beetle, which we have taken care of in this bill, or possibly to go out and meet the onslaught of the prairie dogs, marshaled in formidable array, or to investigate the diseases of squirrels and cockroaches and things of that character. [Laughter.]

This is a perfectly amazing provision, Mr. President. The number is not limited. The entire fund can be used for these purposes.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. Does not the provision cover aeroplanes? The Senator from Missouri seemed to think it did not. It evidently does. Is not an aeroplane a motor vehicle?

Mr. KENYON. I am a little in the air on that proposition. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. In view of the fact that this is a highly remedial statute I presume it will be given a liberal construction, and therefore it might include aeroplanes and dirigible balloons.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think a balloon could hardly be called a motor vehicle, but an aeroplane could.

Mr. BRISTOW. It depends on the kind of a balloon, does it not?

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. KENYON. I will give up the floor to the interesting colloquy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. REED. With the kindness of the Senator, I wish to settle this legal question for the Senator from New Hampshire. If there is a doubt as to dirigible balloons being included—and there must be a doubt if the Senator's mind raises one—I suggest that the bill ought to be recommitted in order that the committee may prepare a proper amendment so as to include dirigible balloons and leave no doubt in the mind of anyone.

Mr. BRISTOW. I did not mean to take the Senator from Iowa off his feet, because he was delivering what I regarded as a very sensible criticism upon this bill. I merely wanted to supplement some things that had been said.

We have been trying here for a number of years to cut out the unwarranted extravagance that Government officials have fallen into since the automobile has become such a desirable pleasure vehicle; but here, in the face of the war that the Senate has been making upon this inordinate desire to utilize public funds for private purposes, there is proposed an amendment which breaks down all restrictions and permits the Agricultural Department to buy any kind of motor vehicle it wants for any purpose.

Mr. GALLINGER. And any number.

Mr. BRISTOW. And any number, and to use for that purpose almost any appropriation that it has, and then it commits the ridiculous folly of saying that if any man uses one of these conveyances for anything but official purposes he shall go to jail. It is so utterly ridiculous that it is strange that it should ever come from a committee of the Senate.

If it is necessary, as the Senator from Oklahoma believes, that some of these modern methods of transit should be used by the Department of Agriculture for official purposes, let the bill specify where their use is justified, naming the particular places and purposes for which they are to be used. A blanket provision like this, however, is an invitation for every man who can induce some of his superiors to believe that on some official trip he might make a little better time in a motor vehicle than by the regularly established way of travel, to get an automobile for that purpose, and then he will use it as a pleasure carrier. You can see them all over this town. Why, there was a report made here not long since that indicated, I think, that there are about 350 automobiles in use in the District of Columbia that are paid for at public expense. It is a national scandal, and nothing else, and ought not to be helped along by an amendment like this in this bill.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I have enjoyed the Irish wit that has been scintillating here for the illumination of the Senate on this subject. I rather think, however, the Senator from Kansas has misapprehended the purpose of this amendment. It does not enable anyone connected with the Agricultural Department to purchase any sort of a motor cycle or automobile for use in the city of Washington. It expressly limits the application of funds for that purpose to machines to be used in connection with the field service.

I shall not retort in kind about the ridiculousness of these amendments, but shall assume that every Senator knows—at least, every Senator who knows anything—that the Forest Service could not be administered without means of conveyance of some character. In case of fire the conveyances ought to be capable of as much speed as possible, in order to arrest such conflagrations. It is utterly unimaginable that the service could be administered with efficiency without such means of transportation. They have them now. They have automobiles now, they have motor cycles now, and they use them now; and the Government has not been plunged into bankruptcy, either by the purchase or by the use of these vehicles in connection with the Forestry Service. On account of a provision in the legislative bill, however, they can not have repairs made to the machines they now own, and they can not purchase others whenever they become indispensable.

In order to meet that situation and in order to avert the catastrophes which have occurred with too much frequency in the past, this provision has been inserted in the bill. Senators know that forest fires aggregating millions of dollars of loss have occurred in this country from time to time. I believe one Agricultural bill appropriated a million dollars to enable the Secretary to wage war against forest fires. Now we make appropriations for that purpose and at the same time deny the facilities for transportation or the means of conveyance in order to carry on this service, which every Senator knows is absolutely indispensable. It is a part of the fixed policy of the Government. Of all absurdities, it would be the most absurd to tie the hands of the department, to set aside forest reserves worth millions of dollars, and then, out of peewee enconomy, if I may so call it, deny the department the facilities for arresting forest fires and diminishing the enormous loss which frequently occurs from that cause.

So far as hog cholera is concerned, we recently appropriated half a million dollars for the arrest of hog cholera and for the dissemination of information and serum which will enable the farmer to wage war against that calamity. I think the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] had some part in that needful legislation. The purpose of introducing this amendment was to enable those who are to serve the farmer in case of exigency to reach his farm without loss of time, so that the half million dollars may be expended efficiently and not wasted.

Yet we are to higgle over a small appropriation to make this service efficient. We higgle over everything that goes to the farmer as if it were a king's ransom. Only this morning a committee reported out a pension bill of $7,000,000, and courageous and chivalrous Senators will vote for that bill and yet will scruple here over a trifling appropriation which is essential to special services that are of importance to the Government and of importance to the people.

There is no appropriation carried in the pending amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think we ought to treat this provision seriously and ought not to indulge in Irish wit or Iowa wit or Kansas wit or Missouri wit, but we ought to indulge in a little common sense.

Mr. GORE. In the Senate?

Mr. REED. The Senator suggests "in the Senate." Well, in view of the provisions of this bill, if it is to pass in its entirety I would say it would be well enough for those who advocate it to abandon the rule of common sense and just let it go through on some other basis.

Now, about the commonest thing in the world is to ask to have something done and insist that it shall be done because it is brought forward under the name of some good object or purpose or in the name of some estimable class of our people.

I ought perhaps now to pause and withdraw or qualify the statement I made a moment ago, because it would seem unkind to the Senator from Oklahoma, and I did not so mean it; but the words "sense" and "senseless" have recently been bandied around so frequently that we involuntarily fall into the habit of using them. I do not mean to say that my good friend in the making of this bill has been guilty of senseless conduct, but I do say that in my humble judgment there are a number of provisions in this bill that ought not to be here. The fact that this is an agricultural bill ought not to be used to cover up real and substantial objections. Whatever the farmer is entitled to let us by all means give him. Whatever will tend to promote the general welfare through the promotion of agriculture we are justified in appropriating money for. But it does not follow that we shall vote for every appropriation suggested simply because it is said to be for the benefit of the farmer.

In my opinion this particular provision is not for the benefit of the farmer, but for the convenience, the delectation, the delight, and the recreation of certain employees of the Agricultural Department, and that not one single substantial benefit will come to the farmer from it.

Let us take the illustration furnished by the Senator from Oklahoma. He states that it is necessary to have motor vehicles in order to go to the relief of the farmer when the hog cholera has made its appearance. It is a little difficult to discuss that in polite and parliamentary language, but I am going to try to do it. Does anybody assume that hog cholera breaks out in an instant of time, spreads itself over an entire community like a consuming flame, and that the saving of five minutes of time is essential to the prevention and arrest of the disease? One would, from the arguments adduced, imagine that hog cholera rode on the wings of the wind and traveled miles in a few seconds. I am not posing at all as a hog-cholera expert or an agriculturist of learning, but I may be permitted to remark that the way hog cholera makes its appearance is that some morning a farmer goes out and finds one or two of his pigs coughing. He does not know just what is the matter with them for a day or two; it may be not for a week or two. If he suspects it is hog cholera what is there for him to do? If he has a telephone he calls up the place where the serum is kept and asks them to send him some of it by parcel post, and it gets there that afternoon; or if he is in an unusual hurry he can take his own automobile and go after it; or if he belongs to that humble class—which is becoming rarer every day in the country—that does not own automobiles, he puts a boy on the old gray mare and sends him after the serum, and the boy gets back the same day, even long before it is certain whether the pigs have cholera or a cold.

Now, are we given to understand that the Agricultural Department claims that they must have a corps of experts all the time sitting in automobiles, ready charged, and waiting so that upon the instant they can fly like the lightning across the prairies and deliver hog-cholera serum? Does not everybody know that that is a pretext, a sham, and a fraud, and utterly ridiculous?

These motor boats are for what purpose? I will tell you the purpose. Fines or no fines, penalties or no penalties, the purpose of the motor boat is for some gentlemen to go fishing in. Are we going to chase down the Egyptian moth on motor boats? Are we to run down the ravenous and destructive beetle with motor boats? It looks a good deal more to me like an excursion for soft-shell crabs than it does for Egyptian beetles.

The Senator tells us that we have forest fires and must have these improved methods of locomotion to put out the fires. Where do the forest fires occur? It may be a violent presumption, but I assume that they occur in a forest; and if they do occur in a forest, it is a matter of common experience laid up among the fundamentals and covered with the dust of ages that there are not very many good roads out in the woods. In the city of Washington we have not yet adopted motor vehicles to carry our fire engines to fires, and why? Although we have these miles of beautiful paved streets, level as the floor, and although powerful machinery has been constructed for the purpose of moving the fire apparatus with great rapidity, and although moments frequently make the difference between the loss of thousands of dollars and a loss of nothing at all, we still on these paved streets have not adopted the motor vehicle for our fire department. Why? Because we need something besides speed even where we have perfect streets. We need reliability; and it is an open question to-day whether the horse is not better than the automobile, taken night after night and day after day and year after year, for transporting fire apparatus in a city. But when you get out in the country, out in the forest reserves, up in the mountains of Colorado, above the clouds in many instances, and you talk about traveling rapidly with an automobile, it is perfectly patent that it can not be done except in a few places.

The opportunity to use such vehicles in a practical way will be very limited. The utilization of them for the purpose of putting out fires, carrying hog-cholera serum, or running down the Egyptian moth must be a very limited use. But there is a broad, a general, a universal use; a constant, a consistent, an eternal, and everlasting world without end demand. That demand is found in the desire of the gentlemen who work for the Government to ride around at the Government expense and who would like to have a Government motor boat, an automobile, a bicycle, a flying machine to do it in.

I am disgusted with this sort of legislation. I saw the Senate spend two days' time debating the question of buying a new automobile for the Vice President of the United States, and then vote it down. Although the Vice President is here at the immense expense necessarily attaching to his office, although he is required in obedience to his official duties to go from one part of the city to another and to make many calls, social and otherwise, and although every department head in the city of Washington either has a team or two teams of horses or an automobile, yet we saw the Senate turn down a proposition to buy a new automobile for the Vice President of the United States. Possibly if we pass this bill we might have the Agricultural Department appoint the Vice President purveyor in chief of hog-cholera serum and transfer to him the use of an automobile. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, the Senator says this clause carries no extra appropriation. Oh, yes, it does, or it would not be here. If there is no money to be expended under it, then it is a dead letter and the ink was wasted that was used in printing it. It appropriates every dollar carried in several sections of the bill that is not used otherwise; so if there is any surplus left out of any such other appropriations the employees of the Agricultural Department can buy automobiles with it. If they want the automobile more than they want to carry on the work—if the desire for rapid transportation is greater than the desire to carry out some specified object of this bill, they ca buy the automobile and let the object go. Here is the language:

That the lump-sum appropriations now available or herein made for the field work of the Department of Agriculture, including appropriations for the administration of the national forests, for hog cholera demonstrations, and for preventing spread of moths shall be available for the purchase, maintenance, and repair of motor vehicles and motor boats necessary for the proper and efficient conduct of the work.

Of course, the decision of the gentleman who wants the machine is final, binding, and conclusive, and from it there is no appeal. Once the machine is ordered, that is the end of the matter.

Truly, this bill is strangely and wonderfully made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, if this Agricultural appropriation bill has served no other purposes, it has furnished opportunity for some Senators to display a large amount of original wit, considerable sarcasm, and in some instances it has displayed a lack of knowledge as to the real needs and wants of the farmer and the real intention of the Agricultural Department in handling the appropriations made in the bill.

Some of the Senators seem to think that it is almost criminal to have a new motor cycle and a boat or two for the purpose of carrying the men representing the Government over different parts of the country for the work they have to do. This is no new appropriation. It simply specifies what we may do with a lump sum from the different appropriations.

I am opposed, as a general rule, to lump-sum appropriations. I am certainly opposed to a lump-sum appropriation when it can possibly be avoided. I believe that every appropriation should be made for some specific purpose; but there are many instances when that can not be done. In the past the practice has been very general to make appropriations in lump sums, and it has been impossible to get away in one session from that practice. The paragraph now under discussion provides—

That the lump-sum appropriations now available or herein made for the field work of the Department of Agriculture, including appropriations for the administration of the national forests, for hog cholera demonstrations, and for preventing spread of moths shall be available for the purchase, maintenance, and repair of motor vehicles and motor boats necessary for the proper and efficient conduct of the work.

I do not believe that any Senator believes that the Department of Agriculture or the Secretary of Agriculture or the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, who especially has charge of this work, for one moment would lend themselves to the purpose of securing holiday or free rides or boat fishing excursions for the employees of that department. If there is any department of the Government that is handled with economy, with care, and with efficiency, it is the Agricultural Department. This appropriation says:

And repair of motor vehicles and motor boats necessary for the proper and efficient conduct of the work.

These vehicles and these boats will be used for no other purpose than when they are absolutely necessary in the work to be done.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BRADY. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. It will be observed that there is no limit to the purchase of motor vehicles. There is a broad provision in the bill for the purchase of those vehicles, but there is no limitation, or so far as I can determine, no supervision. Now, I will ask the Senator from Idaho, who very likely knows all about this matter, how do they get these vehicles? Does the Secretary of Agriculture recommend them or act upon the recommendation of some subordinate as to the purchase of them?

Mr. BRADY. The Assistant Secretary of Agriculture appeared before the committee and stated to the committee that they had been very careful, indeed, relative to the purchase of these motor vehicles, and they had not purchased motor vehicles in any case except where they thought it would be a saving to the Government. In other words, we will take some one engaged in farm-demonstration work. While the amendment calls for motor vehicles and some other vehicles, the real work to be done is in the farm-demonstration work. A man thus engaged must necessarily keep a horse and buggy or a horse and a spring wagon or a team and a buggy in order to go over the country and visit the different farms. That team will have to be fed all winter. A motor vehicle simply requires an expenditure while the machine is in motion, and the department thinks, and I agree with them, that it would be a great saving to the Government to have motor vehicles whenever a showing of economy can be made.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. BRADY. And in no other case would he recommend it. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I can understand that, so far as motor cycles are concerned, but does the Senator mean to say that, even if an automobile is used for six months of the year, it is cheaper than it would be to maintain a horse for the entire year?

Mr. BRADY. Most certainly it is. That has been demonstrated beyond a doubt. I am glad the Senator asked the question, because I know he asked it in good faith.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have done so.

Mr. BRADY. In a farming community when you use a team you can not drive and stop and visit men for any length of time worth while and drive to exceed 30 to 40 miles a day. Thirty miles is a good long distance to go in a day with a team, while you can travel three or four times that far with a motor cycle.

Mr. GALLINGER. I agree with that.

Mr. BRADY. You can take an automobile and travel at the rate of 20 miles an hour without any risk of danger whatever.

Mr. GALLINGER. That presupposes that the machine will go.

Mr. BRADY. They too often go a little faster than that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have had experience.

Mr. BRADY. I was going to say the demonstrators can do three times as much work in the same length of time with an automobile or motor cycle. There is absolutely no question but that it is a great saving. The men who do this work of farm demonstration are not given to joy riding. They are not given to going out and having a good time, but they are men picked from the rural walks of life, men who have devoted their lives to agriculture and who have an interest in the work. They do not use automobiles on the farms in the country one time in a thousand where they should not use them.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRADY. In a moment. In order to prevent that, we have put a penalty of not more than $1,000 fine and six months in jail in case they do so. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator suppose that the men who are going to run these automobiles are practical farmers engaged in farm work? How do they get into the Agriculture Department? I do not know of any way by which the farmer breaks into the Agriculture Department.

Mr. BRADY. You will find a great many practical farmers in the Agricultural Department. The demonstrators all have a special training for the work they have to do.

Mr. REED. Does not every one of them have to pass a civil-service examination? Is it not all covered in the civil service? Are not the places being filled up now with that class of men?

Mr. BRADY. Yes; but they have to show that they understand practical farming or else they can not pass the examination.

It is all right to talk about the horny-handed farmer in being connected with the Department of Agriculture. However, the fact remains that the farmer appreciates what the Agricultural Department is doing for him and has been doing for him in the years gone by.

Some may sneer at him; others may treat his calling with levity, but the farmer, the man behind the plow, is the bulwark of our country. And it is a mistake to say that the farmer does not appreciate and enjoy modern improvements. He avails himself of every opportunity to secure knowledge, and the farmers of this country would not tolerate for a moment a "lily-handed" representative of the Government endeavoring to give them instruction. The men who give instruction in farm-demonstration work are practical men with actual agricultural experience, and the department knows it would be useless to send men of any other character to give farm demonstration.

Mr. REED. Do not let us get the idea into our heads—I hope the Senator has not got it—that the old horny-handed farmers are going to have these automobiles and that they are the men who are going out to demonstrate farm work. That has been turned over to the civil-service gentlemen, to a man with lily fingers and education, who passes a civil-service examination, and who would not recognize the difference between a Jersey cow and a Holstein unless he looked at the picture in his book.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me a moment?

Mr. BRADY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think I stand here as perhaps a practical representative of the agricultural classes in that I do nothing else but farm. I do not think there is a clause in the bill fraught with more practical benefit, if used judiciously, by reason of the conditions throughout the South, and I presume in the West as well, and in the Middle States. Let us take the hog cholera. The Senator from Missouri said a moment ago that if a hog began coughing, the next morning or the next day, it may be a week after, a diagnosis can be made. I say it is all over then; the old carcass is carried out.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRADY. I yield.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator say that a hog dies of cholera in one day?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; I have seen them die in less than a day, if it is a genuine case of cholera.

Mr. REED. The Senator is thinking about Asiatic cholera.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; I am talking about hog cholera. It was not Asiatic in my State when it cleaned out my herd. They die at once, and they are carried out.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I think the Missouri hog is entirely another breed and another class. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think that must be the case.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the trouble is that these senatorial farmers have allowed their hogs to have the cholera six or eight weeks before they suspected it, and did not really know that they had it until they died. Consequently they think it is a speedy and fatal disease, but it is not.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BRADY. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me, I may in my own time have something to say on this question, but we are here attempting to legislate as best we may for the general benefit of the agricultural classes. I am here to state, as a practical farmer, living a considerable distance from a railroad, what is the condition when there appears a certain disease for which there is provision made for stamping it out. In my county town, for instance, 20 or 30 miles away, there is established, as necessarily must be the case, headquarters representing the Agriculture Department. I phone there or I telegraph there for some one to come to diagnose glanders, for instance. That is not provided for here, but I use it as an illustration. A disease appears among my cattle or hogs. The army worm has made its appearance. The department has studied this question under our appropriations and they are immediately called to give me the necessary information. I would have to wait upon the schedule of the railroad train, 4 or 5 miles away. In the meantime, if the department is provided with these modern facilities of rapid transportation, some one who is able to give me the information can be at my place before the railroad could reach the nearest station.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Just one moment. If in the meantime there threatens to be a rapid spread of the disease, the one who has charge of the rapid means of transportation can carry this knowledge throughout the rural communities where they have not facilities for railroad transportation. In farming, as well as in law, the element of all modern business is the element of time and distance. I do not see why there should be a balking at availing ourselves of rapid transportation through the rural districts such as is afforded by the motor cycle or the automobile or any other means that may be employed in order to stamp out that which confronts the farmer with disaster and losses to him. If there be sickness in the family or if there be threatened danger to the life of the individual which is predicated upon the spread of some disease, we invoke the most rapid means of transportation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I can not do that without the permission of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BRADY. I yield.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina if the country doctor, who treats men and women and who doctors folk, as a common and general thing is provided with an automobile?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. He is provided with an automobile in South Carolina; and if he is not he does not catch the case. I will ask the Senator from Missouri this question: If you were attacked with a case of acute indigestion or some other stomach trouble, and you thought you were face to face with death, would you prefer to deal with some fellow driving an old gray horse or with some man with an automobile?

Mr. REED. I would have in the ordinary districts of the country, in a majority of instances, to risk the man with the horse, because I think it is safe to say that there is not 20 per cent of the country doctors who have these vehicles, though they may have them in the Senator's State. The Senator says that after they have discovered this disease they must get around and let the neighborhood know of it. If they have so many automobiles in the Senator's State, let me ask him if they have any telephones?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. We have telephones.

Mr. REED. Well, would it not be quite feasible to telephone around the neighborhood and to tell the farmers?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri if they travel on telephones in Missouri?

Mr. REED. No; but the news travels on telephones.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. What good does news do, if you have not got a man to demonstrate the use of the serum?

Mr. REED. The Senator from South Carolina has stated what they want is an automobile, so that when they found there was cholera they could run around the neighborhood and tell the rest of the folk.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Can you telephone the serum?

Mr. REED. No; but you can telephone the information.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Precisely; but you have not got the serum.

Mr. REED. I will tell you that if you did telephone the information that the serum was necessary the farmers would gather in very quickly to get it.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I recognize the fact that we are trespassing upon the time of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BRADY. I should like to conclude my remarks.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further?

Mr. BRADY. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The point I make is this: There is not a facility for the propagation of news and the betterment of the agricultural districts which is not felt in every home in every city and throughout the whole country; and yet, as the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] well said the other day, when we come to the question of appropriating money for the betterment of the agricultural classes there are actually Senators who stand up here and speak about making appropriations to eradicate bedbugs! I should imagine, Mr. President, that if there were not a sufficient appropriation made and if great attention is not given to agriculture along practical lines, the cost of living and the profits that accrue to some of the professional men will be more materially reduced than they now are. I shall not, however, go into that, but with the permission of the Senator from Idaho I will close with this statement: I believe, as a practical thing, that as to the use of the motor cycle in the eradication of these forms of disease amongst animals and insects and plant life, we could not appropriate money to a better use than to give these officials who have the practical knowledge of how to eradicate these pests the facilities to transport themselves rapidly, and to go to the rescue of those upon whom the production of the clothing and the food and the welfare of this country depend.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

Mr. BRADY. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WEST. I do not ask the Senator to do so. That is all right.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BRADY. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. KERN. I want to inquire whether any amendment has been provided which limits the amount of this appropriation?

Mr. GORE. I will say that there is not any provision which limits the appropriation. The Senator seems to regard this as the launching of a new policy of the department as to automobiles and motor cycles. It is simply to avoid the contingency of being forbidden to repair machines that they already have or to purchase others when they become indispensable. It is simply the continuation of the present policy; and no large expenditure is contemplated under this provision. The Secretary of Agriculture stated that most of the machines that are actually needed in the administration of the service cost less than a thousand dollars each. They seem to me to be entirely indispensable to the successful administration of affairs.

Mr. KERN. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me a moment further?

Mr. BRADY. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. KERN. It is true, doubtless, that the Department of Agriculture has automobiles; it is true that all of the departments have automobiles; it seems that the purchase of automobiles has become such a very common matter with the heads of departments and the heads of bureaus that the people of the country are beginning to complain about it.

There are many things in this bill to which I do not subscribe, and there are many things in all of these appropriation bills to which I do not subscribe. It seems to me there is extravagance in almost every page of this bill.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. KERN. I will do so in a moment. On almost every page of every appropriation bill there is extravagance. I have remained silent as to this bill because it pertains to the interests of the farmer; but when it comes to giving to the Secretary of Agriculture or to any other officer of this Government a free rein to go out in the markets and buy all of the automobiles he wants—because the words "motor vehicles" are used in the bill—to buy all the automobiles he desires, at his own discretion and on the recommendation of the underofficials who want to use them, I think it is time to draw the line.

I am opposed to this amendment unless there shall be some limitation embodied in it curtailing the power somewhere and limiting the extent to which the Secretary may exercise this right. I think it is going entirely too far; and so far as I am concerned, I draw the line on this provision which gives the unlimited right to these officials to go out and buy all the automobiles they may desire.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BRADY. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I think possibly the Senator from Indiana has overlooked the fact that these automobiles and motor cycles are limited to use in the field service. It is not proposed to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase automobiles for use in the District of Columbia. My understanding is that they have no automobiles in connection with the department, except possibly a motor truck. This is limited to field service and to automobiles actually needed in the administration of the service. The Senator from Indiana will readily realize that in connection with forest fires and the administration of the Forest Service these motor vehicles are indispensable where the distances are considerable.

Mr. KERN. I have understood that the automobiles in use by all the departments are presumed to be limited to official use, and yet everybody understands that they are not so limited. It is a matter of common comment and general knowledge that the automobiles which are in use in the District of Columbia by the heads of departments and bureaus are not limited to official use, and it is because of experience in that line that I regard it as a dangerous proposition to give this power to the Secretary of Agriculture, or to any other officer, only limited by the phrase "official use."

Mr. GORE. That is not the only limitation. The Senator from Indiana will observe that it is limited to field service, which excludes the District of Columbia. No purchase of automobiles could be made under this amendment for use in the District of Columbia.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I do not understand that the men engaged in the field service necessarily live in the District of Columbia or that their operations are in the District of Columbia. A man in Indiana who is connected with this service is provided with an automobile, as is the man in Ohio, the man in South Carolina, the man in Michigan, or the man in Wisconsin. Wherever there are fields for service, there these automobiles may be brought into play, and the power is given to the heads of departments to buy all that are needed.

Mr. McCUMBER and Mr. VARDAMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. BRADY. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota, who asked me to yield to him some time ago.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to ask the Senator from Idaho one or two questions as to what has been done with reference to this amendment and how it came to be in this bill. I think you can destroy any good measure by merely ridiculing it; it is the easiest thing in the world; but I assume that this amendment was not put into this bill unless some one recommended it, and I understand that it was recommended by the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture. Am I right in that understanding?

Mr. BRADY. That is correct.

Mr. McCUMBER. And the other day Senators on the other side of the Chamber were making long and very fine addresses concerning the wonderful intelligence, character, foresight, and economy of the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture and proposed to raise his salary because of his remarkable efficiency. He is the same Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, is he not, whom they are now criticizing in this bill because they fear that he will buy all of the automobiles that are for sale in the country?

Let me ask the Senator another question. Is there not provision in this bill for experts to drive over the States of Ohio, Indiana, Missouri, and over other States for the suppression of hog cholera, to give the necessary and proper advice to the farmers, and is not that true also with reference to farm demonstration work all over the United States? Am I correct in that?

Mr. BRADY. Yes; the Senator is entirely correct.

Mr. McCUMBER. If that is true, does not the Senator himself know, and does not every other Senator who has any knowledge at all as to the cost of transportation in this country know, that to accomplish the same amount of work you can purchase a cheap automobile—by "cheap" I mean a small automobile——

Mr. WARREN. A motor cycle.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; an automobile that can be purchased for $450 or $500 or $600, with which you can drive over the entire country and cover five times as many miles in a day as you can in driving with a horse and wagon, and the absolute cost of it would not be one-half or one-quarter of what it would cost you to do the same work with a team of horses.

Mr. BRADY. That is true.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, if that is true—and I know from absolute experience that it is true—then I submit that the Secretary of Agriculture in recommending this provision as a matter of economy is on the right track, and so long as we provide in this bill for a large increase in the number of inspectors who must travel over the country, and so long as we appropriate large sums for the suppression of hog cholera and half a hundred other things, necessitating the conveyance of experts of the department over the entire United States, the principles of economy, not to mention other considerations, demand that we should have a cheaper transportation than horse transportation is to-day.

I admit that if you purchase a very high-priced automobile, a Packard or a machine of that kind, weighing 4 or 5 tons to start with, and with a high cost of upkeep, it might not be as cheap as driving a single horse over the country, but by purchasing a small, light automobile the department will be enabled to accomplish from four to five times as much work in a day, with no more expense than there would be to take a team and drive over the same locality.

Mr. BRADY. And there would be no expense except during the time the automobile was running.

Mr. McCUMBER. The cost of keeping a team, Mr. President, during the winter would be at least from two to three times as much as it would cost for all your work done by automobile in the summer.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BRADY. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. KERN. I should like to inquire of the Senator from North Dakota if he ever heard of a department head—and such officials have bought scores and hundreds of automobiles—buying a cheap machine like the Ford?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not tried to follow that; but I think, if they have any sense of efficiency, of cheapness, and of economy, they would not attempt to buy a large, expensive automobile to drive over the country; and I am assuming that the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, who has been praised so highly upon the floor of the Senate, would be capable of determining what was an economical automobile to be used in taking the agents of the department over the country.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I inquired when I first arose if there was any limitation in the provision as to the amount that might be expended for this purpose. I find there is not.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to say to the Senator that there is a limitation.

Mr. KERN. I found there was none at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. There is a limitation which should be sufficient for a faithful and efficient officer of the Department of Agriculture, and that limitation is found in the words, "necessary for the proper and efficient conduct of the work." That ought to be enough to guide the Secretary of Agriculture in keeping within proper limits.

Mr. KERN. I think not.

Mr. McCUMBER. If it will not, it ought to.

Mr. KERN. If there were adopted an amendment that would limit the cost in some way, so as not to give the department full range to spend all the money they desired for this purpose, I would not object, because I recognize the force of what the Senator has said in reference to the economy of the automobile—the cheap automobile—over the horse and wagon; but my objection to the amendment reported by the committee is that there is no limitation at all, and I think there ought to be one.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BRADY. I should like to get an opportunity to conclude my remarks, but I will be glad to yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to inquire of the Senator if the condition of the weather and how much mud there is in the road does not make a good deal of difference where you use motor cycles and automobiles? Indeed I think that if the horse doctors or the hog doctors are called out on a rainy day in some sections of the country they would have to hire a livery team, and let their automobiles remain in the stall until the roads dried.

When you come right down to the practical application of this item, of course, the motor vehicles provided for are to be used for the convenience and pleasure of the officers of the Government who want to use them in that way. We know, as a matter of fact, in the practical application of automobile privileges that the officials of the Government use them for the pleasure of themselves and their families more than they do for official purposes. In this city Government officials will make use of street cars and let their wives and daughters use Government vehicles to make their calls in. That is what happens, and that will happen in every place where the Government furnishes a lot of automobiles to officials to be run at public expense. They will be used for their convenience, and then we are called upon to vote this unlimited, unjustifiable extravagance in the name of the American farmer.

Do you think the farmer does not know when the Government, which he pays to maintain, is being imposed upon? You can not fool him by saying that these automobiles are being bought for his pleasure and his profit. He knows better. They are not being bought for that purpose; but money that could be used for his advantage and for his benefit is appropriated for the purpose of buying automobiles for public officers.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I feel that the great trouble with some Senators is the fact that they do not really understand the real intent and purpose of this particular provision of the bill. I would be one of the last Senators in this body to advocate the adoption of this amendment for one moment if I thought the privileges given here would be abused. As the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] has well said, there are over 200 automobiles in use by officials here in the city of Washington. All the money that will be expended for automobiles, motor cycles, and motor boats for the millions and millions of farmers will not cost one-half of the amount of money appropriated for automobiles to be used by officials in the city of Washington.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] asked a question as to the limitation of this appropriation. It was a proper question to ask, and I hope I can explain it to his satisfaction. The Assistant Secretary of Agriculture appeared before the committee and advised us that there were some lump-sum appropriations, the entire amount of which could not be used for the purposes for which they were appropriated, small fractions of such appropriations being left over, and he stated that he would like to have provision made in this item so that such amounts could be used for the purpose of buying extra motor cyles and things of that character. At his suggestion there was incorporated in the amendment the provision:

> Said vehicles and boats shall be used exclusively for official service and any other use shall constitute a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment of not more than six months.

That was not put in here simply for a word picture. The Assistant Secretary of Agriculture meant what he said when he told us he would be the first man to punish any official of the department who would use one of the motor vehicles proposed here to be authorized for any other than official business.

I desire to say a word about the thousand dollars for a motor boat. Senators who speak about this in such a light way I fully believe do not understand what such boats are used for. I do not presume that the men in the Forest Service or the farmers are fools enough to think that motor cycles can be used to fight a forest fire or go through the timber, but there are large forests with lakes in the center of them, and there may be 15 or 25 guards on one side of the lake, and a fire may start on the other side. It is absolutely necessary that they get across the lake in the quickest time possible, and they can do it in no more expeditious way——

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. BRADY. Just a moment—than by the use of one of these motor boats. Motor boats are in use now by the department. This is not the inauguration of the policy. It is the intent of the Assistant Secretary or of the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase not to exceed one more boat; and that is the reason why the price of it has been limited.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. What limit is there?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to ask——

Mr. BRADY. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask how many lakes are there of the kind the Senator has just described in all the forest reserves?

Mr. BRADY. That would be a hard question to answer. In my State there is one lake 30 miles long and from 3 to 6 miles wide——

Mr. REED. Oh, well, there are thousands of them, as a matter of fact, are there not?

Mr. BRADY. There are thousands of lakes, I presume; not that many, I imagine, in forest reserves, but there are a great number of lakes where there is no possible way to protect the timber in any other way except by using boats. However, they are not all situated in that manner.

Mr. REED. I understand—and I am not asking these questions at all with any other purpose than eliciting information—that there are single counties in the State of Minnesota, not in a forest reserve, however, containing lakes numbering above a hundred, and in all of the forest reserves of the country there must be thousands of lakes. If the only way to protect the timber is, as the Senator says, to have a boat upon a lake, so that you can run across it rapidly, it occurs to me that we will have some thousands of motor boats to purchase, or else there will be no protection on the great majority of these lakes. Manifestly putting a boat upon a lake out in the Senator's State might be all right on that lake, but it would be no benefit to another lake some distance away. If we are going to put motor boats upon these lakes, let us treat them all alike and give each of them motor boats. If that is to be done, I think that our American boat yards and shipyards will be engaged in a very lucrative business in the near future.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BRADY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator spoke of the limitation of the cost. What is the limitation of the cost?

Mr. BRADY. I will read:

> That the lump-sum appropriations now available or herein made for the field work of the Department of Agriculture, including appropriations for the administration of the national forests—

And so forth. This provides for the use of the unused portions of lump-sum appropriations.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes; but the Senator, before he was interrupted by the Senator from Missouri, referred to a limitation of the cost to a thousand dollars.

Mr. BRADY. I simply referred to what the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture said to the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have another question that I desire to ask. Has the Senator, or the committee, made any estimate of the percentage of the total lump-sum appropriations that would be used in this work?

Mr. BRADY. I do not think the committee made any particular estimate; but I understood the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture to say that the amounts to be so used would be very small—just what is necessary for the official service incident to the department.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Does not the Senator think that it would be well to limit even the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BRADY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I would like to get through with my questions first.

Mr. GORE. What I want to say is pertinent to what the Senator is inquiring about.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Very well.

Mr. GORE. I understand at the present time there has been provided and the department already has in the Forestry Service 2 automobiles and 10 motor cycles, so that the purchase of these machines is not intended to embark the Government upon a new policy. They are already equipped with what they need; but in case the motor vehicles now owned should require repairing the department does not want to be helpless so that they can not make the repairs, and in case they should need an additional motor cycle they desire to be in a situation to buy one without special legislation upon the subject. I am afraid Senators have unleashed their imaginations here and fancied that the department intended to buy out several automobile concerns in order to equip the department.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming and Mr. WEST addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. BRADY. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am sure that I have not unleashed my imagination at all. I simply asked a very definite, practical question, as to whether or not there was any estimate made by the department or whether the committee had made an estimate as to what percentage of the general lump-sum appropriations carried in this bill would be available or would probably be used under this particular appropriation.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator can probably make his own estimate from the figures I have just suggested.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There is absolutely no estimate whatever.

Mr. GORE. I suggested that they have at present 2 automobiles and 10 motor cycles. That is the present equipment. The amendment under discussion is simply to enable the department to maintain its equipment up to the present standard of efficiency.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Instead of vesting an absolute discretion in the Secretary of Agriculture to use all the lump-sum appropriations, if he thinks it necessary, does not the Senator think it would be well to limit the amount that could be so used, say, to 10 per cent of the lump-sum appropriations?

Mr. GORE. I have no objection to that whatever. I think the figures indicate that the department have pursued a conservative policy, and I have no doubt——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There are no figures.

Mr. GORE. And I have no doubt they will continue to pursue a conservative policy; but if any Senator is afraid that extravagance might run riot I am perfectly willing that the limitation be made.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am not particularly afraid, Mr. President; but here we have an appropriation that covers all the lump-sum appropriations in this bill. Fifty per cent of the hog-cholera appropriation, 50 per cent of the lump-sum appropriation for the Forestry Service, 50 per cent for various other items, could legally be used by the Department of Agriculture for the purpose of this amendment.

We have no estimate as to what may be necessary; we have no notice, particularly, that anything is necessary. The chairman of the committee himself says the appropriation is only needed for upkeep, while the provision itself says it is for the purchase of machines. Now, what are we to consider?

Mr. GORE. The Senator misunderstood me if he understood me to say that it was limited to the upkeep. I said it was to maintain the equipment at its standard of efficiency. That is what I said, and what I continue to say.

Mr. President, I understand that the department has had this power in the past, and I have never heard of any protracted debate, nor have I ever seen the fears of Senators so much excited or agitated heretofore in regard to it. My understanding is that Agricultural appropriation bills in the past have granted this power, and that it has not been abused. Senators have never seemed to draw it in question in the past. I have no objection, however, since they have been seized with this sudden fit of economy, to fixing the maximum so that the Secretary can not abuse this power to buy Ford automobiles or automobiles of other concerns necessary for this purpose. If that will allay the agitation of Senators, I think it would be eminently fitting and proper.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BRADY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WEST. I suggest that, in order to limit this matter, we could insert a proviso in the amendment reading—

Provided, That there shall not be an expenditure to exceed $25,000.

Mr. BRADY. That suggestion, I think, would be entirely acceptable to the committee, or I think the suggestion of the Senator from Wyoming would be equally acceptable, for the reason that we know that the Secretary has no thought of using any greater amount than that.

In conclusion, I wish to say that, of course, it is not possible for all the Members to have the information that the committee had relative to this matter. I think this has demonstrated conclusively that where we have committee hearings, as a result of which amendments are inserted, it is well to have the hearings taken down in shorthand and printed for the benefit of the Senate. Then the other Members of the Senate will understand the conditions as we understand them.

This amendment was placed in the bill with the thought of using the amounts left over from lump-sum appropriations simply to purchase a few additional motorcycles and other necessary equipment. The Secretary stated to us positively that he would buy only one motor boat. There was one particular place where he wanted to use a motor boat, and he believed it was necessary. The Senators here are not to blame for not having that information, but that was the statement that he made to us and that is why I favored this amendment.

I believe the farmer is entitled to just, fair, and equitable consideration, and no more. I am quite sure that he does not ask or expect any more, but I do believe that it is our duty to give him what is his just due. When we have appropriated this large amount, I think it is only fair and equitable that we should make some plan by which this knowledge can be diffused at the least possible expense; and that was certainly the thought in putting this amendment into the bill.

While I have no authority to speak for the committee, so far as I am concerned I should be perfectly willing to accept either the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST] or the suggestion of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] and limit this amount so that there can be no abuse of the authority. There is absolutely no doubt, however, that they do need these vehicles as provided in this amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BRADY. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Did I understand the Senator to say that there was no stenographic report of the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry?

Mr. BRADY. There was not.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator or to the chairman of the committee that it seems to me that this is a bill where there ought to be a stenographic report. We have it on almost all the other appropriation bills. I think the Senator from Idaho is quite right in saying that some of us do not understand this question as the committee understands it. Possibly, had the hearings been reported, we would have been so enlightened by reading the hearings that we would have saved a good deal of time to-day.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I may say that I was impelled by an extreme sense of economy not to incur the expense incident to having a report made of the hearings; but from this time forward I shall not withhold illumination from the Senator from New Hampshire, because I am satisfied we might thereby expedite the debate sufficiently to save a great many thousand dollars, perhaps more than we have saved by our manifestations of economy in regard to these amendments.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am gratified to have the chairman of the committee assure us that in the future the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry will be reported and printed. I think that ought to be done, and I join with the Senator in saying that very likely it will be a matter of economy. It does not cost a great deal to have the hearings reported and printed, and it has cost a good deal to discuss this one this afternoon. If we have been discussing it because of insufficient information or misconception of the facts in the case, we are not to blame for that, because all I have been doing has been to try to secure information with a view of satisfying my own mind that this is a wise appropriation. It did not so appear to me in the first place, and it does not so appear to me now; but possibly I am mistaken about it.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I wish to say, in conclusion, I fully agree with the Senator from New Hampshire that on account of the Members of the Senate not having the same information we have they do not favor this amendment. I do not believe there is a Senator on this floor who, if he could have been present and could have heard the statements and explanations offered by the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, would have hesitated a minute to give the small amount that will be used under this amendment.

While, as I have said before, I have no authority to say what shall be done by the committee, I should be very glad, indeed, to have the chairman of the committee state what he is willing to do about inserting a limitation in a manner that will satisfy everybody.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BRADY. I do.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho a question before he takes his seat. I was called from the Chamber, and did not hear all of the speech he was making; but do we understand him to say that there are no automobiles to be purchased, but that this is simply to carry the automobiles now owned by the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. BRADY. No; I do not so understand the situation.

Mr. KENYON. I understood the Senator in that way.

Mr. BRADY. It is to keep the work up to its present efficiency. If an automobile is worn out, the Secretary desires authority to purchase a new one, and I think he intends to get some new motor cycles. I certainly understood him to say in the committee that he intended to get only one motor boat for some particular place in one of the forest reserves where he thought it was very essential that the department should have it.

Mr. KENYON. Then I am in error in understanding the Senator to say that no automobiles are to be purchased. There are automobiles to be purchased, as the Senator understands?

Mr. BRADY. There will be some automobiles purchased.

Mr. KENYON. Is there any restriction upon the kind of automobiles, or the expense of the automobiles? Are they to be Pierce-Arrows, such as the Senator enjoys, or are they to be Ford automobiles, such as some of us hope to be able to buy some time?

Mr. BRADY. The Secretary said he would not favor purchasing any automobile that cost to exceed from four to six hundred dollars.

Mr. KENYON. From four to six hundred dollars?

Mr. BRADY. Yes; that they would not need any more expensive automobiles than that, and that he would not purchase automobiles costing any more than that sum.

Mr. KENYON. But there is no limitation of that kind in this clause.

Mr. BRADY. No; there is nothing of that kind in the amendment, and that is the reason why I think the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire is a good one—that we should have these committee hearings reported and printed, so that the other Members of the Senate may understand and know what we heard in the committee.

Mr. KENYON. I wish we could understand it as the members of the committee understand it.

Mr. BRADY. I know quite well that if the Senator from Iowa had been present he would have favored this amendment, after hearing the statement of the officials representing the department.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, he will recall the fact that the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, who gave this valuable information to the committee, has resigned; and it will not be for him to purchase these automobiles in the future, but for some new Assistant Secretary, who may entertain more liberal views.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, even though I am a Republican, I have sufficient confidence in the present administration to believe that we shall have an honest and efficient Assistant Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry before the Senator from Idaho takes his seat. If I understand correctly the information laid before the Senate, it is that the officer making the expenditure has unlimited discretion, as far as this bill is concerned, if enacted into law. Is that correct?

Mr. BRADY. That is correct, within the present limits. I will ask the chairman of the committee to answer the question, as he has the information at hand.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me make a further inquiry, then, from the Senator. Has he the figures or the information in regard to the sum of money covered by this omnibus power that is limited only by the discretion of the purchasing officer?

Mr. BRADY. We have been attempting to give that information to the Senate this afternoon so far as we have been able. As I said before, the chairman of the committee has more information on that point than I have, and I shall be glad to have him answer the question, as I think he has the information on his desk.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will merely repeat what I have already said, that this amendment continues the power which has heretofore existed. Under that power the Forestry Service, I believe, has purchased 2 automobiles and 10 motor cycles. Under an amendment carried in the legislative bill the department could not repair these 2 automobiles and 10 motor cycles, and if an additional machine should become necessary it could not make the purchase.

That is the sole object of the amendment. The power has not been abused in the past. The Department of Agriculture has proven itself worthy of this confidence in the past, and I have no doubt it will prove itself worthy of this confidence in the future. The 2 automobiles and 10 motor cycles illustrate that fact.

For my part, I have no indisposition to continue this trust. If, however, Senators fear the department may be seized with a fit of extravagance and may purchase several hundred thousand automobiles, I have no reluctance to fixing a limit to quiet any uneasiness that may exist.

Mr. SHERMAN. What I wish particularly to inquire is as to the amount of money in the bill that might be affected by this discretionary power. I have made a rough estimate of it. I do not intend that my estimate shall be taken as accurate, but I believe it approximates accuracy. I think the omnibus discretionary power that the adoption of this amendment would vest in the purchasing officers of the department affects between four and five million dollars of the appropriation.

Mr. GORE. It is simply a continuation of the power that already exists. It is to prevent that power being stricken with paralysis by the legislative bill, thus impairing the efficiency of the service.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois is very moderate in his figures. This provision reads:

> That the lump-sum appropriations * * * made for the field work of the Department of Agriculture, including appropriations for the administration of the national forests, for hog-cholera demonstrations—

And so forth.

The one item of appropriation for the administration of the national forests alone covers $5,558,256.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator will understand that it does not appropriate so much in a lump sum, and this language refers only to the lump sums.

Mr. REED. Each of the various items of the Agricultural bill carries a lump sum with it, and they therefore would be covered by this proposition.

I am not criticizing the Senator. I simply say he was very moderate in his statement.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I was particularly directing the inquiry to the lump-sum or gross-sum appropriations, because they are the ones that are specifically embraced in this amendment.

A very cursory examination will show that about 25 per cent of the entire bill is affected by this amendment leaving a discretionary power of purchase. I do not say it will be abused. In many things I am willing to trust, and we must trust, the discretionary power of the heads of departments. It is not, however, the right way to make appropriations.

We are passing an appropriation bill here, or so much of it as this amendment affects. There is no limitation in it as to the number of machines that may be purchased, or the kind of motor boats or other vehicles of transportation. It is all left to the discretionary power of the purchasing officer, whoever he may be; and that discretionary power may be scattered through a great number of hands as it radiates and percolates down from the head of the department. Where this power of purchase will finally land, whether it will be in somebody who is investigating the best way of pulling stumps, or investigating boll weevils, or the most expeditious way of killing prairie dogs or exterminating other noxious insects or dangerous carnivorous animals, is something that nobody on the top of the earth so far has been able to give any accurate information about, so far as I have been able to learn.

This bill covers a very great variety of subjects. It is a sort of omnibus bill for the entire Agricultural Department. When I look through the vast number of purposes for which this money is to be expended, I am rather disposed to think some limitation ought to be put on this committee amendment if we are to arrive at anything like accuracy in appropriating money.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. I proposed—I think the Senator has come in since—that the amendment be amended by adding a proviso at the end of the paragraph to the effect that the expenditure for this purpose shall not exceed $25,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will join the Senator in authorizing some reasonable expenditure.

To continue where I left off, however, in order that the RECORD may contain briefly the reasons for such an amendment, the field work would include the investigation of sheep diseases and sheep dipping. That might cover, in the western country, a very great mileage and a very great necessity for divers kinds of machines, expensive and otherwise. It covers the investigation of ticks on a great variety of domestic animals, cattle and other range animals, and other vermin and ravenous parasites of different kinds, including lice. That is a very extensive subject where they are well bottomed in their investigations on live stock. It includes the investigation of horse breeding, the different varieties of stallions, and so forth. That would include every place, not only in the western country but everywhere else, where horses are raised either for ornament or for utility. It includes ostrich farms and ostrich investigations in Arizona and California. The distances in that country are very great. It includes an investigation of the diseases of ginseng. It includes an investigation of diseased bark on chestnut and pine trees. It includes an investigation of the diseases of flax, forage, and various field grasses. It includes an investigation of broom corn, which extends over a very wide area of country, all the way from Oklahoma to eastern Illinois. It includes an investigation of botany and botanical specimens that are good either for food for domestic animals or for the cure of various complaints to which the human family may be subject. It includes a study of cactus plants and dry-area products, together with an investigation——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GORE. I have procured an estimate from the department as to the number and cost of the automobiles and motor cycles that might be necessary. They estimate for eight motor cycles, costing a total of $2,274, and two automobiles, costing $1,250 each. I suppose a limitation of that amount, or perhaps a little in excess of that amount, would be satisfactory.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there be some limitation on the number of vehicles purchased and the price per vehicle, I can see where it might effect some economies in operation, as the Senator from North Dakota says; but what we are objecting to is the unlimited expenditure of money, subject only to the discretion of the head of a department.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BRADY. Would the Senator be satisfied to vote for this amendment providing the amount were restricted, say, to $10,000?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I do not think any such amount as that would be necessary.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have some limitation put on the amount to be expended for each machine. If not, one bureau would be profiting at the expense of another.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. I have no objection to limiting the amount. The estimate here calls for about $3,400 or $3,500. I should like to place the limit a little in excess of that amount, so that I may ascertain more definitely the exact amount, and in conference I will adjust it to the exact prospective requirement. I would suggest a limitation of $10,000 for the present, and if that should prove more than will be necessary it can be reduced later.

Mr. WARREN. Did I understand the chairman of the committee to suggest $10,000?

Mr. GORE. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I think that would be a reasonable request.

Mr. GORE. I think that is more than is necessary.

Mr. WARREN. If the chairman will allow me a moment, of course this debate has contributed a great deal to the gayety of nations, as a debate always does upon the brown-tail moth, the gypsy moth, and so forth; but there is no use in trying to evade the fact that there is a necessity for a certain number of these motor cycles and inexpensive automobiles, properly used, in the field. If the Senator will accept or offer an amendment that the amount used for this purpose shall not exceed $10,000, I think the matter may be passed upon without delay.

Mr. BRADY. I think the committee would be satisfied with that amendment.

Mr. GORE. I move that amendment, then—

Provided, That the amount thus expended shall not exceed $10,000.

I may say that I will undertake to reduce that amount in conference if we find that it exceeds the probable demands for the service.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that is over twice the amount that was estimated.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the estimate did not include repairs. Of course there is quite an amount needed for repairs.

Mr. REED. I think all of this paragraph is subject to a point of order. I am very loath to make the point of order, but I think the Senator ought to be perfectly content with the amount of $5,000, because the so-called estimate does not go above $3,400, I understand. I think, therefore, $5,000 is a reasonable limit.

Mr. GORE. I may say to the Senator that if we make it $10,000 we can reduce it in conference, whereas if we make it $5,000 we can not increase it.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senator will make the limit $10,000. As he has remarked, if it shall appear that it can be reduced in conference, of course it should be reduced; but there are repairs and supplies that are constantly called for in connection with all of the machines that the department now owns. I agree with the chairman in the statement that it is necessary to state specifically in this bill some amount that can be used, or they will not be able to run the machines they now have in case there is the slightest injury that makes necessary an expenditure for repairs.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I move the adoption of the amendment I have mentioned.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an amendment pending. It is the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. The pending amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Before the word "moths," on line 5, it is proposed to insert the words "the boll weevil and."

Mr. GALLINGER. I simply desire to say that, as the appropriation for the boll weevil in this bill is so much larger than that for moths, there is no reason why that appropriation should not share in accomplishing the desired result.

I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma proposes an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] proposes to add, at the end of the paragraph, the following proviso:

Provided, That the total amount to be expended for such vehicles and boats, under the provisions of this paragraph, shall not exceed the sum of $10,000.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Oklahoma that that had better go in after the semicolon after the word "work" in line 7.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; that is right.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert, after the word "work," in line 7, the words just read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, line 16, in the appropriation relative to "Meat Inspection, Bureau of Animal Industry," it is proposed to strike out "$300,000" and insert "$390,000."

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ought to say in connection with this amendment that the tariff law which was enacted in October last—October 3, I believe—required the inspection of imported meats. The estimate of the Department of Agriculture was submitted to the Department of the Treasury about that time. It was impossible for them to foresee the amount that would be necessary for the enforcement of that statute. The requirements have exceeded their estimates. For that reason the Secretary of Agriculture has transmitted to the committee the estimate embodied in the amendment which I have just sent to the desk. It is now estimated that $90,000 additional will be required.

I have here a letter from the department on the subject, in case any Senator should desire to hear it read. Otherwise, I will have it printed in the RECORD without reading.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, April 30, 1914.

Hon. THOMAS P. GORE,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR GORE: I desire to call your attention to section 545 of the tariff act of October 3, 1913, which places meat and meat products upon the free list and provides that no imported meat shall be admitted into the United States unless the same is healthful, wholesome, and fit for human food, and contains no dye, chemical, preservative, or ingredient which renders the same unhealthful, unwholesome, or unfit for human food, and unless the same complies with the rules and regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture.

The rules and regulations promulgated under the provisions of this section on October 4, 1913, require that a careful physical inspection and examination shall be made of each consignment except certain small quantities. Chemical analyses are also required to be made to determine the presence of unhealthful or unwholesome ingredients. It is also necessary for inspectors to supervise the destruction for food purposes of all meats offered for entry and refused admission into the United States or to see that the same is exported by the consignee as provided by section 545. This inspection and supervision requires the services, either continuous or intermittent, of a large force of employees at a great number of points throughout the United States. This work is regarded as very important in the protection of the health of the consuming public and increasing the food supply of the country.

The passage of this act has resulted in a great increase in the importation of meat and meat products, as will be seen from the attached table showing the quantity of imported meat inspected by employees of the Bureau of Animal Industry from October 3, 1913, the date on which the tariff act was passed, to March 31, 1914. The amount of inspection work necessary to properly carry out the provisions of the act has correspondingly increased. It is estimated that the additional sum of $90,000 will be required to meet this contingency. It is urgently recommended, therefore, that the item for meat inspection, on page 14, lines 10 to 20, inclusive, of the Agricultural appropriation bill be amended by increasing the amount from $300,000 to $390,000. A statement showing in detail how it is proposed to expend the additional sum of $90,000 is inclosed herewith.

At the time the estimates were submitted and the hearings held in connection with the appropriation bill it was impossible to estimate with any degree of accuracy the amount which would be required to properly carry out the provisions of section 545. While it is true that the bill as passed by the House provides an additional sum of $100,000 for meat inspection, this sum was intended for the most part to provide for the promotion of deserving employees engaged in meat inspection and for such further inspection work, other than that made necessary by the passage of section 545, as may be required from time to time in providing for the inspection of establishments within the United States.

Unless additional funds are provided as requested above for the inspection of imported meat and meat products, the effect will be to reduce the $100,000 in proportion to the cost of the inspection of these imported meats.

Very truly, yours, D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, does that complete the committee amendments?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is unable to state.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, when the bill is in the open Senate I desire to offer two amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is not in the open Senate as yet.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will ask the chairman of the committee whether the committee amendments are completed?

Mr. GORE. I desire to offer two other amendments which have been suggested by the department, and then we will revert to one amendment which was passed over. Unless objection be made, I will take that course. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 61, at the end of line 21, after the word "Congress," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That hereafter all correspondence, bulletins, and reports for the furtherance of the purposes of the act approved May 8, 1914, entitled "An act to provide for cooperative agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and the acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture," may be transmitted in the mails of the United States free of charge for postage, under such regulations as the Postmaster General from time to time may prescribe, by such college officer or other person connected with the extension department of such college as the Secretary of Agriculture may recommend to the Postmaster General.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not like to object to an amendment offered in that way. This is an extension of the franking privilege. As I catch it from the reading, it extends the franking privilege to the teachers of agricultural colleges, and so forth. I think an amendment of that kind ought to be printed, and we ought to be allowed to see it. We all know that the franking privilege has been grossly abused by Senators and Representatives. If they have abused it, what may we expect of private individuals?

When I say "abused by Senators and Representatives," I mean only that the franking privilege has been put to uses far beyond those which were contemplated when the privilege was created. I have in mind one speech which was sent out by one organization for the purpose of promoting ideas satisfactory to that organization. There were 1,750,000 copies of that speech distributed. I have in mind that a great book was prepared and sent out by the sugar interests; that numerous speeches were made in one or the other branch of Congress and circulated, not by Congressmen, but by some society or organization. I might extend these illustrations at some length. It seems to me that it is better not to enlarge this franking privilege. It seems to me we ought to be circumscribing it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. GORE. I wish to suggest that this authority is granted under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Postmaster General. It is, however, limited to one officer connected with this extension work, and who bears authority under the Smith-Lever Act.

The purpose was to bring to the farmers themselves the benefits of the research and extension work which should be wrought out under that organization. But, if the Senator objects, I shall not insist on the amendment, and therefore withdraw it.

Mr. REED. I should like to have a chance to consider it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. WARREN. I ask to offer an amendment on the part of the committee, which I send to the desk. It is to come in on page 59, after line 20.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 59, after line 20, insert:

The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to lease, for terms not exceeding 10 years, buildings or parts of buildings in the District of Columbia necessary for the accommodation of the Department of Agriculture, if by so doing he is able to secure substantial reductions in rentals and better accommodation for the business of his department.

Mr. WARREN. The amendment comes directly under the appropriation for rent of buildings, and will greatly reduce the rental.

Mr. STONE. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wyoming, who is familiar with the facts, as to the number of buildings now occupied by the Agricultural Department, where they are located, and their capacity.

Mr. WARREN. I do not know that I would be able to give the location of each one, as to street and number, but the list is here. The amount of rental is $108,329. It is found on page 59 of the bill. The rental for the Bureau of Animal Industry is $2,220; for the Bureau of Plant Industry, $26,420; for the Forest Service, $25,075; for the Bureau of Chemistry, $17,320; for the Bureau of Soils, $306; for the Division of Publications, $5,000; for the Office of Solicitor, $2,160; for the Office of Experiment Stations, $5,000; for the Office of Public Roads, $3,500; for additional rent in cases of emergency for any bureau, division, or office of the department, $21,328.

Mr. STONE. I had occasion recently to go to the Bureau of Chemistry, and I noticed as I rode on the street that there were several structures of considerable magnitude, the signs over the doors showing what they were, and one and all were under the Department of Agriculture. Does the Senator know whether the buildings to which I refer are rented or whether they belong to the United States?

Mr. WARREN. The property of the United States consists of the two large white buildings not connected and two or more red brick buildings very near them. The others are rented buildings.

I desire to say, if the Senator will allow me, that this rental proposition is one that I grieve over, as other Senators do. We ought to erect the necessary buildings, and not rent them. We are paying nearly $400,000 in the District of Columbia for rental in the different departments. We have greatly reduced the rent in some of the departments by authorizing the department, as we propose now to do, to rent longer than for one year at a time. For instance, the entire building that the Navy Department occupies was provided for by a similar amendment on an appropriation bill, except that the rental should not exceed a certain number of cents a square foot, naming a low figure. We have also provided for the building in which the Department of Commerce is located. This amendment endeavors to assemble these buildings at a much lower rent, and it will greatly facilitate the business. It will probably cost less in clerical force. That is the intent of the amendment.

Mr. STONE. Does the Senator know the number of buildings rented for the use of the department?

Mr. WARREN. The number is not given here, but the objects are given for which they are rented. Some are very small and other are of considerable capacity, and in some cases the department rents portions of buildings.

Mr. STONE. I take it that a separate building is not provided for each division.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no; in fact, a division occupies only a portion, and sometimes the rest of the building is rented to other parties.

Mr. STONE. I thought we had so much ground about the Agricultural Department buildings, with three or four very large buildings there devoted to the use of that department, the buildings owned by the Government ought to be sufficient to reasonably meet the requirements of any one of the departments without going outside and renting a number of other buildings. I am not informed as to the facts, and for that reason I was making the inquiry.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will understand that these buildings are already rented. We have already appropriated the money for the next year and, under the amendment, if the Secretary can carry out what he believes he can do, under offers made, he can greatly reduce this sum.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, just a word. I have often wondered whether we will ever have adequate facilities for housing any of the departments of the Government, however many new buildings we put up. We made that large appropriation for the Agricultural Department only a few years ago, and with those two magnificent new buildings constructed and the old buildings, still there is not enough room. Take the Navy Department. They were housed in the State, War, and Navy Building for a long time. They got the Mills Building, a very large building, on Pennsylvania Avenue. I suppose they will continue to occupy it.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no. A new building has been erected and the rental is about one-third less per foot than they were paying.

Let me say further to my colleague on the committee, that the lease of the Mills Building was about to expire, and the Secretary of the Navy asked us to appropriate for the next year alternatively, so that he could use it there or rent a new building. There was a raise of some 25 per cent demanded. The renting for a few months was necessary in order to have this greater building built. So there has been a great reduction and a great enlargement of space.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was not aware of the fact that the Mills Building had been entirely vacated.

Mr. WARREN. By the Navy Department?

Mr. GALLINGER. By the Navy Department.

Mr. WARREN. I think the Panama Canal offices are still there, but the Navy Department has, I think, entirely vacated the building.

Mr. GALLINGER. I had the impression that it was still being occupied by some officials at the expense of the Government. Then, this new building has been constructed on G Street near Pennsylvania Avenue, a magnificent building. I do not know how much it cost. It is a large building.

Mr. STONE. That belongs to the Department of Commerce.

Mr. WARREN. It does not belong to the Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a rented building, constructed by private parties, I understand. I refer to the building on G Street a little west of the State, War, and Navy Building. That is entirely rented. The Senator says they have saved some rental by taking the new building rather than the Mills Building. I am glad to know that. I wonder that they did not put up a building large enough to accommodate all the wants of the Navy Department. We have gone over all this time and time again, and it has been discussed here a great deal. The Committee on the District of Columbia has given it a great deal of consideration, but I have never seen where any economies have been reached.

Mr. WARREN. May I correct the Senator?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator must have misunderstood me. The Navy leased one of the buildings which is situated beyond the State, War, and Navy Building. Now, the other building near Pennsylvania Avenue is occupied by the Department of Commerce.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. WARREN. And the Department of Commerce in moving there vacated the new building across from the New Willard on Fourteenth Street and also vacated the building near here which was used for the census. It vacated several others.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand that that has been a very wise disposition, because the building that was occupied by the Census Office never ought to have been occupied by human beings in summer time.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me further, it was obtained exactly in the same way I propose now. We are to see if we can reduce the rent of that building—a part of it at 35 cents a square foot and the balance of it at 37 cents a square foot.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very glad to know that. So, after all, the committee has succeeded in saving the Government something in the matter of rentals. The rentals in this District have been enormous, and they have not only been enormous, but, to my mind, they have been wicked. The owners of buildings have held the Government up in many instances and have charged rentals that have been beyond all reason. Now, if the new building to which the Senator calls my attention, which was constructed by private parties on G Street NW., were rented so as to have a low rental per square foot, that is a very wise thing. I congratulate the Senator and his colleagues in having accomplished that result.

But, after all, this matter of rentals, which has been discussed over and over again, ought to be taken up in some way and investigated to the bottom, so that we could find out whether the Government is paying fair rentals or unfair rentals. However, in constructing new buildings I have very little faith that when we add a new building for any department we are not going to find that it would be occupied immediately and that then they would want to rent a building somewhere in addition. That has been the way it has gone. I think if this matter is to be investigated, every building used by the Government ought to be examined carefully to find out whether the floor space is wisely distributed and to ascertain whether the space might not be economized.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I think we have perhaps placed ourselves under some obligation to men who have built office buildings for the Government, and unless we are very careful in regard to what we do here I surmise we are entering into a project to help some real estate man to construct a new building and get a long-time rental from the Government. Personally I do not think we ought to enter upon a matter of this kind without full consideration. This amendment, I have not any doubt, the Senator from Wyoming thinks is a proper amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, this is not a new matter. It is a matter that is estimated for, a matter thoroughly understood. The way these other building were obtained—we had before the committee the offers of two or three—they would guarantee rental at that price, and I think in every case somebody got the contract at a still lower figure. So there is nothing in this matter in the interest of any real estate venture. This is not only estimated for, but estimated in the regular way. It comes up from the Treasury Department. They state that they can immediately save from $25,000 to $30,000 in just changing a portion from one building to another, but they can not get the fittings up without taking the building for more than one year. Without specific authority there can be no lease made for a longer period than a year, and in no case except as the money is appropriated.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will ask the Senator from Wyoming whether the usual clause in the making of a regular lease is contained in the amendment which he offers, namely, that the Government reserves the right to terminate the lease at any time?

Mr. WARREN. It does; but it is not contained in the amendment as I have offered it. Take the Post Office Department, for instance. Every lease has that written in. Of course, when you are seeking to build such buildings as are now being constructed for the Department of Commerce and the Navy Department, you enter into, say, a five-year lease. On the other hand, I will ask the Senator if he ever knew anybody to get any remuneration from the Government, or any redress, if they moved out before the end of the term?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It may be that redress has never been given, yet, as a matter of fact, if the Government does enter into a contract for a specific term, and breaks the contract, it seems to me it is liable for the damage. I have understood that the clause which provides for a long term is not distasteful to people who want to rent their property, even if there is a clause contained in it that the Government can revoke the lease; and the reason why they want a long-term clause is that in 9 cases out of 10 it will not be revoked. Therefore the Government does get the benefit of having the lower price by reason of a long-term lease, and yet, at the same time, if contingencies should arise that would make it imperative for the Government to move out, it would have the privilege of doing it. I have understood that those leases are favored by the very men who lease property to the Government.

Mr. WARREN. I think they are not specially favored but always accepted, and with a sort of general understanding. Take the War Department: They lease with an option that they may have the building from year to year at the same price for 10 years, while the Government is free at the end of any year to quit the building. Yet the other party is bound for the 10 years by this option. A great many of the leases are that way.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And if the Government gives a notice of six months or a year of the termination of a lease, it is evidently of value to the man who has the property.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to call the Senator's attention to the amendment offered by him, for it seems to me it is exactly the same amendment found on page 73, with the exception that the proviso in the amendment on page 73 is not included in this amendment.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is mistaken. I will tell him the difference.

Mr. SMOOT. Just a minute. The proviso of that amendment reads:

> That each lease shall contain a provision that the same can be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture at any time on 30 days' notice.

I understood that that was satisfactory to the Secretary of Agriculture, but I also understood the chairman of the committee having the bill in charge to say that that amendment would save the Government $2,500 a year; that the plans are already prepared, the money arranged for, and the owners are perfectly willing to have that proviso in. Am I mistaken on that point?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator or some Senator made a point of order, which was immediately acted upon by the Chair, and it went out on a point of order as legislation. The word "hereafter" was in, which made it, of course, a standing statute, and the clause which the Senator has read was in. Now, in order to make it a limitation and not legislation, this amendment is offered with the word "hereafter" left out, and in the interest of economy the proviso is omitted.

I have no objection whatever, if Senators feel that the amendment should contain a provision to give the Government the privilege of canceling the leases, but I think the notice should be longer than 30 days. I am willing to accept that amendment to the amendment, but in the form that this is presented it is a limitation, and it is not legislation. It simply affects this bill for the next fiscal year.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the Senator read his amendment as he has drawn it?

Mr. SMOOT. In listening to the amendment being read I did not catch the elimination of the word "hereafter." I notice now, since the Senator has called attention to it, that that would make a change. What I wanted to call attention to was the proviso, because, as I understand, the men who have had the plans prepared for the building desire to lease it——

Mr. WARREN. If I may interrupt the Senator right there, I want to say that I have never yet approved of the Government specifically agreeing to bind itself in reference to the plans for a particular private building, because I felt that it was better to allow competition in the matter. While we have heretofore had before us, as the Senator says, plans, specifications, locations, and amounts which we felt were satisfactory if we could not do better, we have in each case so legislated that the Government could call for bids; but if nobody was ready to offer greater facilities for the money, the plans first submitted have been accepted.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. That is my idea of the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true; and this amendment is in exactly the same position as are all other provisions of this kind that have been acted upon by the Senate in the past. The only reason why I brought the matter to the attention of the Senate was that I thought with that proviso inserted there would be an advantage to the Government in case it should desire to occupy the buildings for the full 10 years, and for the further reason that I understood that the parties who had offered the buildings intended to save the Government $2,500 a year, and they did not object to the proviso.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I should like to hear read the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 59, after line 20, under the head of "Rent in the District of Columbia," it is proposed to insert the following:

> The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to lease for terms not exceeding 10 years buildings or parts of buildings in the District of Columbia necessary for the accommodation of the Department of Agriculture, if by so doing he is able to secure substantial reductions in rentals and better accommodation for the business of his department.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I offer this amendment to the proposed amendment:

> Provided, That each lease shall contain a provision that the same can be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture at any time on 90 days' notice.

Mr. WARREN. Will not the Senator from Georgia make that six months? That is short enough.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would not object to six months.

Mr. WARREN. I am willing to accept the amendment providing for six months.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I am opposed to any lease that handicaps the Government in putting up its own buildings. I know the Government can erect buildings just as cheaply as anybody else can, or it ought to be able to do so, and could do so if it would use common sense. We already have the ground. I am opposed to all this leasing business. I am opposed to holding back the construction of a Government building on the ground that we must have a Grecian temple every time——

Mr. WARREN. I agree entirely with the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One moment. I merely wish to finish now what I have to say. I repeat, I am opposed to holding back the erection of Government buildings upon the theory that each time we must have a Grecian temple. I earnestly desire to see adopted the policy of putting up our business buildings for the use of the Government which we can put up at a small cost. We have the ground, and we can certainly do so and accommodate the departments with every facility they need at a less cost than we should have to pay as rent. We shall have no taxes to pay, because we contribute a large part to the District upon the half-and-half principle. We shall have no ground to buy, for we already have the ground. If we would abandon the idea that each building must be an extravagantly constructed architectural wonder and adopt a business course we ought within the next two or three years to afford every accommodation which the Government needs in the District in our own buildings.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I would suggest to the Senator from Georgia that the term be extended. I think that the word "terminate" is better than the word "determine" in his amendment, so that the amendment would provide that each lease shall contain a provision that it may be terminated by the Secretary of Agriculture at any time on six months' notice.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not object to six months' notice, for unless we are to construct buildings for our own use and for the accommodation of the Government departments it is just as well to get a good building, and it will take from 6 to 12 months' time to construct a suitable building. A suitable building for any of these departments to meet its wants could be finished in 12 months' time.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I do not know that I am correct in regard to this matter, but my understanding of it is that certain builders here in the city wish to erect a building and to lease it to the Government. There are buildings here which have been erected for the Government's use; they have been erected to please particular departments and have been built under specifications provided by the Government. Unless there is some good reason why we should terminate the leases of such buildings and erect new ones I do not think the amendment should be adopted in fairness to the men who have erected the buildings the Government now leases.

I know very little about parliamentary law, but it does seem to me that the proviso which I have before me is general legislation on an appropriation bill, and I submit that point of order.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senator will not make that point. The amendment is a limitation, and not legislation. If the Senator will allow me, he will find on examination that this is the condition: We are renting certain buildings and parts of buildings which are not fireproof. This proposition is designed to gather together in a fireproof building at a less rental and with better facilities bureaus which may now be scattered in a number of buildings. I know of no better way to bring that about than to proceed along the line indicated by the amendment. We have so provided in a number of instances and have been able to reduce rentals in some cases from ninety-odd cents a square foot to thirty-five cents.

Mr. PAGE. The men who have an interest in this matter have asked me if it was before the committee, and have said that if it was they wanted to be heard. We have had our meetings of the committee and we did not pass finally upon this matter. Now it comes in here at this late hour. While I say that I desire to submit to the better judgment of my friend the Senator from Wyoming, I am going to ask the attention of the Chair——

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Vermont is mistaken in saying that the committee did not have this matter before them and consider it. It was considered, and was in the bill in a different form.

Mr. PAGE. In a different form?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the attention of the Chair to the matter. I submit for the consideration of the Chair that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming is general legislation on an appropriation bill. The amendment reads:

> The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to lease, for terms not exceeding 10 years, buildings or parts of buildings in the District of Columbia necessary for the accommodation of the Department of Agriculture, if by so doing he is able to secure substantial reductions in rentals and better accommodation for the business of his department.

I believe with the Senator from Georgia, that the time is coming in the very near future when we ought to erect and own all the buildings which the Government needs; but I do not believe that we would be doing a wise thing to make a contract for a term not exceeding 10 years and then provide that the lease can be terminated on short notice. We will be expected to keep a building so leased for 10 years, unless there is some good reason why we should not, for when we make such a contract with men who are to erect the building we shall probably foreclose ourselves from terminating that lease, because we have asked them to build it under the expectation and the promise that we will keep it for 10 years if there is no good reason why we should not do so. I submit the point of order, Mr. President.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I should like to be heard on the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has about reached the conclusion that the Chair should rule on the point of order or should not. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is not well taken, for the amendment is just the same as if it were an appropriation for the rental of buildings.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to say just one word in connection with the statement of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], because I would vote against this provision if I agreed with him that the parties erecting the building had any right to continue to claim the Government as a tenant after six months' notice was given. I would not for one moment vote for a 10-year lease that was to be continuous. I would not vote for this lease now if I thought it was to continue for 10 years. The proviso expressly declares, and becomes part of the contract, that we can terminate the lease on six months' notice. The parties who put up the building for the Government under this provision do so at their own risk; they do so understanding that we in our contract of lease have stipulated that at any time we conclude that it is to the interest of the Government not to use that building, after six months' notice the lease ends. It is only with that clause in it that I am willing to vote for the amendment. I think, if we do our duty, the party putting up this building will not rent it to the Government for 10 years.

A small sum of money, relatively speaking, properly expended will accommodate the extra wants of the department. Five hundred thousand dollars properly expended will erect a modern fireproof office building with 400 rooms in it. Three per cent on that sum is the estimate that we could well consider as the cost to the Government, which is very much less than any such building costs the Government when we rent it.

No private citizen can rent a building to us as cheaply as we can build it and own it for ourselves. The private citizen must buy the land, which in all probability would cost as much as the building. The Government has the land. The private citizen must pay taxes on it; the Government provides its part of the tax on the half-and-half principle; so that necessarily the Government can build and own its own quarters with economy and a saving of half as compared to the private renter. The only reason that it has not been done is that what is everybody's business is nobody's business.

I do hope, as the chairman of the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee is present, that he will signalize the work of his committee within the next 12 months by taking steps to terminate leases and to erect buildings for the Government in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I will say in this connection that I fully concur in what the Senator from Georgia has so well stated. The Government pays between six hundred and seven hundred thousand dollars annually in rentals in the city of Washington. At 3 per cent that represents the interest on about $20,000,000; in other words, the Government could easily afford to issue bonds to the extent of $20,000,000 for the erection of buildings and secure quarters far surpassing those now occupied by it in rented buildings. I do not believe it would take $10,000,000 for this Government to erect all the buildings needed in Washington for storage and all other purposes.

I have requested each department to send me a statement of the amount of space they at present rent, the estimated cost of the buildings rented, the assessed value of such buildings, and how much space each department needs for office and storage purposes. These statements have come to me. I have submitted them to the Supervising Architect, and requested him to systematize them, so as to show how much storage and how much office space is needed for the different departments in Washington; how much space is at present rented; the cost and the rate in rentals, together with the value of the buildings, and then to submit with the information thus furnished a scheme for the erection of buildings, stating where they should be located, their nature and purpose, and for what department intended to be used; so that the committee can bring before Congress a bill that will obviate any necessity for continuing to rent quarters for the Government in Washington.

Mr. PAGE. If I may interrupt the Senator, I should like to ask if he has any idea that any responsible corporation, firm, or individual would construct a building such as is contemplated in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming, designed especially for Government use, unless they had some assurance that the Government would occupy it for the 10 years provided in the amendment?

Mr. SWANSON. The Government never had any difficulty in securing all the buildings it desired constructed without any such terms as indicated, for the simple reason that Congress has been so slow in appropriating money to erect buildings for the use of the Government in Washington that those who erect buildings for the Government feel that if they ever lease a building to the Government the lease will run for a great many years. I think the Government would make a mistake to lease any building for 5 or 10 years without the privilege, when it sees proper, of terminating the lease and constructing its own building.

Over half the expense of constructing buildings in Washington is incurred in the purchase of the land. The Government has all the land it needs to construct buildings in Washington, and, as the Senator from Georgia has well said, the Government pays no taxes on its buildings. The tax rate in Washington is about 1½ per cent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on the point of the Government owning land, is the Senator sure that we have enough available land on which to construct buildings?

Mr. SWANSON. I am satisfied that the Government has all the land needed for the construction of its buildings.

Mr. GALLINGER. Undoubtedly the Government has acreage enough, but is it so situated that we can economically use it?

Mr. SWANSON. I think so. We have the Plaza here on which many handsome buildings may easily be constructed.

Mr. GALLINGER. We have just spent $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 purchasing additional land to enlarge the parking system about the Capitol. Does the Senator think that we should proceed to erect public buildings on that land?

Mr. SWANSON. I think the parking system will be more beautiful if surrounded by handsome buildings on all sides. I think that when we erect around the Plaza a group of buildings such as there are now on certain parts of the Plaza, it will be more beautiful than it otherwise would be.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not quite sure that I would not agree with the Senator as to that point; but I think, when we undertake to do it, we will have a great deal of difficulty in persuading the Congress that we ought to do so. I have had a little experience—not much—in that direction. I thought that we ought to put the buildings—for which we have purchased land at a very high cost on Pennsylvania Avenue between Fourteenth and Fifteenth Streets—on Capitol Hill, somewhere near the Capitol, but when the question came up as to appropriating the money for that purpose, there did not seem to be any sentiment in favor of it, and we went down on Pennsylvania Avenue and spent, I do not know how much, but $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 probably, to buy land on which to erect Government buildings. The Senator will recollect the fact that there has been an agitation that swept even this body off its feet that we should buy all of the land on the south side of Pennsylvania Avenue, and we have passed bills here appropriating, I think, $15,000,000 for that purpose, but nothing came of them except that we did buy the one block to which I have referred.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Can the Senator state how many front feet there are in that block?

Mr. GALLINGER. The entire frontage between Fourteenth and Fifteenth Streets, as I understand, and running back to the Mall.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is about 300 feet by 600 feet, is it not?

Mr. GALLINGER. I should think likely it is about that.

Mr. SWANSON. There is ample space there to erect what was contemplated—a building for the Department of Justice, the State Department, and the Supreme Court.

Mr. GALLINGER. That was the purpose, but we did not do it.

Mr. SWANSON. If that were done, however, we would save a great deal of the rental that is now paid.

Mr. GALLINGER. My suggestion was that we did not put it on Government-owned land, but we went and bought that land for the purpose.

Mr. SWANSON. What I am requesting the Supervising Architect's Office to do is to ascertain the amount of the rentals we now pay, to make an estimate of the amount of space that is needed for the future, to make an estimate of what it will cost the Government to construct the buildings, to ascertain where they could be located with a view to both economy and architectural beauty, and to suggest a complete plan for housing all the governmental activities in Washington.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I will say that the Senators are undoubtedly engaged in a very worthy purpose; but when the real, practical question comes before Congress I am afraid they will find there will be a great reluctance to invade this Plaza, or the addition that will be made to the Capitol Park, for the purpose of having buildings placed on it.

Mr. SWANSON. I am not agitating that. I am leaving that to the Supervising Architect's Office, constructors, people who are well posted as to the location of the Government land and what is available, to make a report on the matter, so that we can stop paying rent. It does seem to me that for the Government to pay between six and seven hundred thousand dollars rental in the city of Washington is a most extravagant expenditure for the space and facilities it obtains.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator will recall the fact that when we constructed the Senate and House Office Buildings we had to purchase the land at a very high cost. We did not find Government land on which we could place those buildings. While personally I have thought many times that we ought to have grouped our buildings on Capitol Hill, which would have been much more convenient for all of us, yet that has not been the policy; and I feel reasonably assured in my own mind that when we come to construct these buildings as a rule we will have to buy land on which to place them.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, while the Senator has the floor I should like to ask him a question or two, as he has given us some suggestions indicating a purpose on the part of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Several years ago I think a commission of architects or otherwise were selected to make a report upon a general system of buildings and location of public buildings in the city of Washington, to formulate a system which it might require fifty or a hundred years to complete. They proceeded to do their work. They made models, one of which is over in the Congressional Library now, and another one, I think, down in one of the museums, showing just where these buildings were to be located, and the general lines, using, I presume, for the most part, Pennsylvania Avenue as the center of a long row of those buildings, and going to the extent even of indicating the style of the buildings.

I had supposed that all of our new buildings that were being erected were erected in places in pursuance of that general plan to beautify the city and make it one of the most beautiful cities in the world. Am I to understand now that that plan is to be abandoned, and that we are to put up buildings haphazard, of all kinds and all dimensions, as though the demon of discord had smiled upon the architectural designs of this city, without reference to any plan or any system whatever——

Mr. SWANSON. I thought the Senator wanted to ask me one question. He has asked two or more already.

Mr. McCUMBER. And that we are to put up cheap buildings, as indicated by the Senator from Georgia, because they can be less expensively put up than these Grecian temples, and so forth?

Mr. SWANSON. I judge the Senator is going to ask three questions.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is a pretty long question, but I have to give the ideas that are in my mind, so that the Senator can get more full information on the subject.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me at this stage, since he has asked nearly 20 questions, I will say that there are different kinds of buildings that the Government needs. Its office buildings ought to be of architectural beauty; but three-fourths of the buildings it is paying rent for are simply buildings used for storage purposes. The various departments have to store various kinds of documents, purchases, and things like that.

I see no occasion for having extravagant and handsome buildings for that purpose. I think the Department of Justice ought to have a handsome building, but I see no occasion for having a handsome building, of architectural beauty and fine columns, to be used for the storage of paper, old documents, or seed which is sent out in a year.

My idea was to get the Supervising Architect's Office, both from an architectural standpoint and from a business standpoint, to segregate the two; to find out where to locate buildings for storage purposes which are not very expensive, simply for convenience in business purposes, and then such buildings as are needed for office purposes. The demand for buildings for office purposes is not very large. If we will construct a building for the Department of Agriculture, there is no other one specially needed that has not been provided for.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is the Department of Commerce and the Department of Labor.

Mr. SWANSON. The Department of Commerce and the Department of Labor are newly organized departments. Those two departments need buildings. The Department of State needs some enlargement.

Mr. McCUMBER. The particular purpose for which this provision of the bill is to be enacted into law is to rent a building for certain purposes. Does the Senator mean to convey the idea that it is merely for the purpose of storing old papers?

Mr. SWANSON. Some buildings are.

Mr. McCUMBER. I mean this building.

Mr. SWANSON. I was not in the Chamber when this amendment was read. I simply entered into the debate on account of the discussion of the general construction of buildings in the city of Washington in response to a suggestion made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. I do not know what this amendment is. I do not know what its provisions are. I was not in the Senate at the time that particular matter was discussed.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Georgia stated a short time ago that we could erect for some four or five hundred thousand dollars a building that would contain a thousand rooms.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, no; the Senator has missed my statement on each side.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I said $500,000 and 400 rooms.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And I state again that a 10-story handsome, modern office building, as handsome as you will find in any of the cities of the United States, can be built for $500,000—a building of handsome finish, marble inside, with 400 rooms in it averaging from 18 to 20 feet square.

Mr. McCUMBER. And what outside? We have marble inside. Now, what would we have outside—bricks?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Part marble, part granite——

Mr. OVERMAN. Indiana limestone.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I would not agree to that. I want to be excused from any more Indiana limestone. I would suggest granite and hard-pressed white brick.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator mean that the Government could do that? A private individual could.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator think we want any more pressed-brick buildings? Do we want another one of these buildings like the Pension Office in the city of Washington? Have we not passed that stage?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I regard that as a very common building.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think it is an uncommonly abominable building.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator can not exceed my view in his expression as to its architecture or its general construction.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that there is one building that we have been renting for $18,000 a year, and finding that we are going to move out they are now offering it to us for $12,000 a year.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do say that we can erect a 400-room office building, as handsome as any office building that has been erected in Washington City—and there are several handsome office buildings here—for $500,000.

Mr. McCUMBER. What I want to insist upon is that it is a waste of the money of the people of the United States to put up any cheap, ugly buildings that we will probably pull down in 5 or 10 or 15 or 20 or 30 years. Further, I believe that if we have adopted a systematic plan in the city, we should follow that plan, and that economically it will be to our advantage, even though the buildings cost a little more to erect—beautiful Grecian temples, if you please—in the first instance. Then we will have something that we will never need to be ashamed of and will never need to tear down.

I believe there will be a great deal of economy in this. I wish to protest, however, against any further system of erecting such buildings as this one down here on the Avenue—the post-office building—which we now want to tear down, and the little office building down here in which are housed several hundred or a thousand people which we call the Census Office—nothing more than a great pen, the hottest place on the face of the earth. I do not want to spend any more money for buildings of that kind.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri will state his inquiry.

Mr. REED. I wish to ask what question is before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] as modified.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I only wish to protest against the suggestion of the Senator from North Dakota that I am advocating the erection of any cheap buildings that we will be ashamed of and that we will be compelled to take down in 20 years. I insist that it is practicable to erect a modern, handsome, steel-constructed, fireproof office building, with 400 rooms in it, for $500,000, as handsome as the office buildings in any city in the United States, 10 stories high only.

I would make them uniform. I would not build them haphazard. I would adopt a uniform plan of a 10-story office building for our surplus office forces, just such as we are now renting for the surplus office force of the Agricultural Department. I am perfectly willing to see constructed for the Department of Justice one building of pronounced architectural style; but barring giving each department one such building, a system of high-class office buildings of modern style can be erected, and the number can be enlarged and enlarged and enlarged from year to year as our business increases. In that way the Government and the people can be saved a great deal of money, and yet a system of buildings can be erected that will be pleasing to the eye, and even, I am sure, satisfactory to the artistic tastes of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator if he believes that a 10-story building erected, for instance, close to the new Post-Office Building would be a very harmonious affair? Would not it spoil the appearance of both of them, as much as a 10-story apartment house constructed alongside of it would? I believe our buildings ought to be made to harmonize with each other and with the general plan. I can not conceive of any plan that would allow a 10-story office building to be constructed and have it consistent with any idea of architectural beauty.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. How many stories does the Senator wish to erect?

Mr. McCUMBER. Enough so that the building will look well.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What is the Senator's figure?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have no design, because I do not claim to be an architect; but if the Senator will look over the plans that have been adopted by the commission I think he will not find anything above a three-story building that has been selected for any of the public buildings.

I think the Senate Office Building, the House Office Building, the Post Office Building just completed, and the new building for the District of Columbia, are buildings embodying great architectural beauty. None of them is above three stories in height. I can not conceive of erecting that class of buildings, with their style, and then mixing in here and there a skyscraper to set them off.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. A 10-story building is not a skyscraper.

Mr. REED. I ask to have the amendment stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment as modified. The Senator from Missouri asks that it be read. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 59, after line 20, it is proposed to insert:

The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to lease, for terms not exceeding 10 years, buildings or parts of buildings in the District of Columbia necessary for the accommodation of the Department of Agriculture, if by so doing he is able to secure substantial reductions in rentals and better accommodation for the business of his department: Provided, That each lease shall contain a provision that the same can be terminated by the Secretary of Agriculture at any time on six months' notice.

Mr. REED. I suggest to the author of the amendment, instead of the term "Secretary of Agriculture," the use of the words "can be terminated by the Government."

Mr. WARREN. I do not object to that, if the Senator thinks it is necessary.

Mr. REED. I think it would be very much better to put it in.

Mr. SWANSON. I suggest "by act of Congress," to make it specific.

Mr. WARREN. You can not do that. Another thing——

Mr. REED. I withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. WARREN. I think, on reflection, the Senator will have to admit that somebody is the Government, and I think the head of this department ought to be the person to do it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a short while ago the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] offered an amendment to which I objected at the time. It has since been amended or changed. I have no objection to it in its present form.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I send the amendment to the desk with the alteration and renew my offer of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 61, at the end of line 21, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That hereafter all correspondence, bulletins, and reports for the furtherance of the purposes of the act approved May 8, 1914, entitled "An act to provide for cooperative agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and the acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture," may be transmitted in the mails of the United States free of charge for postage, under such regulations as the Postmaster General, from time to time, may prescribe, by such college officer or other person connected with the extension department of such college as the Secretary of Agriculture may designate to the Postmaster General; but such designation shall not extend at the same time to more than one person for each college.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, on page 61, lines 5 and 6, I move the insertion of the words "May 8." That will complete the title of an act referred to in the pending bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to fill in the blank in the amendment already adopted on page 61, so that, after the words "and the act approved," there shall be inserted the words "May 8."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. The junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], I understand, desires to move an amendment, and I yield to him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendments are not yet disposed of. The next committee amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 18——

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the Senator from Oklahoma to ask that that amendment might go over. Does he object to the consideration of it at this time?

Mr. GORE. No, sir; I do not. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is present. I asked that it might go over on account of his absence.

The SECRETARY. On page 18, line 22, after the word "Government," the committee propose to insert the following words:

Or at the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, the grades of cotton below those standardized by the Government.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 19, line 1, after the word "tests," insert a colon and the words:

And provided further, That of the total sum appropriated in this item, $25,000 shall be immediately available.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have noticed in this bill that in several instances appropriations have been made immediately available. There seems to be no urgency in this case. The bill will be effective on the 1st day of July next, five or six weeks from now. I ask the Senator from Oklahoma if he intended to urge that amendment?

Mr. GORE. I will refer that question to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. This is an amendment with which he is most familiar. I assume the desire was to begin the preparation of these samples prior to the opening of the cotton season.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, the cotton year begins practically September 1 and ends September 1. It is desirable that the appropriation which has already been voted by the Senate shall become available and benefit cotton growers. It will take some time to get the samples and have them standardized and have the grades furnished the principal markets. Thus it will be of untold benefit.

Mr. GALLINGER. Would there not be time to begin July 1 to do this work?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; there is considerable work to do.

I wish to state to the Senator from New Hampshire that there seems to be a misapprehension as to the benefit of this appropriation. Two bales out of every three that we sell are sold abroad. A standard sample is to be furnished. The cotton in the field is discolored. Under an appropriation which I secured several years ago we provide and the Government is now issuing cards to show the spinning value—that is, the textile strength and the bleaching qualities—of the different grades. But Europe, buying two bales out of three, really in a way sets the price; that is, in the absence of knowledge on the part of our growers.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that I do not propose to occupy a moment's time in opposing the amendment, and I will not do it; but the custom is growing up of making these appropriations in part immediately available, and it seems to me it is an evil. But if the Senator thinks it is necessary in this instance, I have not another word to say.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that I do think it is an evil, but it has grown out of the fact that we have ignored the agriculturist of this country so long that when he does come into his own he wants immediate relief.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not agree to that any more than I agree to the intimations that have been made over and over again that those of us who have discussed some provisions of this bill are not friends of the farmer. I have become a little weary of hearing that statement.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I want to disclaim that as to the Senator from New Hampshire. He has been my good friend for nearly six years, and he has never failed to respond to any real legitimate claim of the agriculturists. I was not applying the statement to him, and I do not wish the statement to go into the RECORD without this modification on my part.

Mr. GALLINGER. That bouquet is sufficient for me to take my seat and allow the amendment to be agreed to, if the Senate sees fit to adopt it.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I understand that the committee amendments have been disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee at the top of page 19.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there further committee amendments to be offered?

Mr. GORE. There are no further committee amendments. I have agreed to yield to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] to offer an amendment. There is a rearrangement of the language of one clause necessary, and he desires to submit an additional amendment. I will ask the Senator from North Dakota to defer a moment for that purpose. It will require only a moment, I am sure.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. THOMPSON. It will take but a moment. On page 20, line 7, I desire to amend by changing the word "beet-sugar," before "investigations," to "sugar-beet," which is the proper term to be used in connection with such an investigation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 20, line 7, before the word "investigation," strike out the word "beet-sugar" and insert in lieu "sugar-beet."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMPSON. There is another amendment to that paragraph which is deemed necessary by the Department of Agriculture in order to give proper authority for conducting the sugar-beet investigation. I send the amendment to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the words "methods of culture," in line 9, page 20, insert:

And to determine for each sugar-beet area the agricultural operations required to insure a stable agriculture.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator from Kansas think the appropriations as made here would allow the Secretary of Agriculture to obtain that information?

Mr. THOMPSON. I am offering it at the suggestion of the Secretary of Agriculture, and it is deemed necessary by him in order to perform the broader work in connection with the sugar-beet industry that he desires or has in contemplation. We are not asking for any additional amount of appropriation, but simply to give broader authority in the use of the $41,495 which is already appropriated. The amendment has the approval of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not see that the amendment does any harm, but it does seem to me it is imposing an amount of work upon the Secretary of Agriculture that can not be possibly done by this appropriation.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have here a letter from the Department, if the Senator desires to hear it read.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not going to object to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I now offer an amendment to come in on page 19, and I wish especially to call the attention of the Senate to the particular amendment. On page 19, lines 4, 5, and 6, we have this original provision in the bill:

For investigating the handling, grading, and transportation of grain, and the fixing of definite grades thereof, $76,520.

We have here, then, a law directing the Secretary of Agriculture to fix definite grades, but no provision is made as to how he is to proceed to do it, how he is to enforce it, or any legislation on the subject, with the exception of the general direction that he is to fix definite grades.

To keep wholly within the rules, I have prepared an amendment which is nothing but three or four sections of what was known as the Lever bill, recommended by the Secretary of Agriculture. I am not offering the entire bill. I do not know how many Senators are paying the slightest attention to this matter, but I can not go on while a general discussion is taking place among Senators.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am trying to direct attention to the amendment as soon as I can get to it.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator had better wait until I offer the amendment before he raises a point of order against it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am soliciting attention to it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want the Senator to have an opportunity also. I wish I could get a little attention of the Senate when I come to any matter pertaining to the interests of the farming community. We spent two days in discussing one little amendment that provided for $10,000 to be expended by the Secretary of Agriculture in getting vehicles to visit the sections infested by hog cholera, and so forth. After two days of labor upon that $10,000 item it was finally voted out, and then immediately we voted $90,000 without anyone asking a question.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am discussing the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I raise a point of order. What is before the Senate for discussion?

Mr. McCUMBER. I supposed that the bill was before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. If Senators were disposed to pay attention there is no amendment before the Senate, and they could not pay attention to it. The Senator is discussing an amendment before it is offered or read from the desk.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will keep his coat and vest on——

Mr. SHERMAN. I will.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will proceed and get through with my discussion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I rise to a point of order, Mr. President. I insist on the original point of order without further comment or decorous debate of the matter last emanating from the gentleman.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and, of course, is subject to discussion by the Senate, and the Senator from North Dakota is in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the amendment is offered?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; he has a right to discuss the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. He can discuss anything.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am sorry that the Senator becomes so impatient. I was just about to suggest that immediately there was offered an appropriation of $90,000 to help the meat packers in any further inspection of meats, and it did not even elicit a question but passed through without any discussion whatever, but the moment we touch upon a thing that really is beneficial to the farming interests of the Northwest my good friend gets impatient, and Senators do not seem to have time to give the matter any consideration whatever.

Mr. President, when we were discussing the grain inspection and grading bill here the other day—and if Senators will give me their attention I will agree to take only a few moments in discussion—I pressed a bill for the purpose of providing, first, for the Federal grading of grain; secondly, for the uniformity of grades, and, thirdly, for the inspection of grades. The only objection to that bill was based entirely upon the question of the inspection. Those who opposed it did not wish to take away the actual power of inspecting and grading from the bodies which are now doing that business, but all of them spoke in favor of the Federal standardization and also in favor of uniformity. No one spoke more strongly in favor of both those propositions than the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], who was entirely satisfied with the entire Lever bill. I did not believe at that time that there was any intention of voting the entire Lever bill into the law, but I did believe—it may be I was deceived in the belief—that there was a sincerity of purpose in the idea that that which had been recommended by the Secretary of Agriculture, namely, Federal standardization and uniformity of grades, did not have an opponent in the Senate of the United States. So to secure at least that much toward a great remedy that I hope we will be able to work out some day, the Federal standardization of grain, just as you have provided for the standardization of cotton, I have prepared an amendment for which I hope I shall be able to secure all of the votes on the other side of the Chamber.

I have voted for your cotton bill. I have voted right along for those provisions relating to the sending of experts to the cotton districts to teach you how to get rid of the boll weevil. I have gone further, and have sustained your proposition that you shall have samples of cotton at each one of the great selling places of cotton throughout the South, so that when the farmer brings in his bale of cotton he can compare it with the several samples he will have there before him, and will be able to determine for himself something of the real value of that cotton. I think that is a most estimable provision, and will operate very beneficially to the cotton growers of the South.

I would not dare to ask one-quarter as much as that for the great grain farmers of the Northwest. I had the courage to ask that the Federal Government do the inspecting for both sides—the producer and the consumer. That was voted down by a very heavy majority, but no one uttered a single word against what was known then as the Lever bill, introduced by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], which provided for standardization and also provided for Federal supervision.

In my amendment I do not even ask for Federal supervision. I simply ask that the Government fix the standards, the same as you are fixing the standards in cotton. The Secretary of Agriculture can take all the time he wants, but when he has determined upon the standard, whether it takes one year or two years or three years or so many months, he may then provide how those standards shall be enforced.

I want to make it certain that I am not reaching further now than the mere standardization by the Government of grain. In the bill itself that is provided in these words:

For investigating the handling, grading, and transportation of grain and the fixing of definite grades thereof, $76,320.

Matters of this kind have sometimes been objected to upon the ground that it was general legislation, and I have been startled by the proposition as to what constitutes general legislation as distinguished from special legislation. I even find that if you would direct the Secretary of Agriculture to rent a certain building, Senators will raise the objection that it is general legislation. I have always read, and I read in Bouvier's Dictionary and in the rules that are given here, that general legislation is legislation that relates generally either to an entire class of people throughout the United States or generally to all classes, and special legislation is that which relates to a particular person or thing or locality. That is the distinction between special and general legislation.

This amendment is perfectly proper under that rule. It limits and provides for the method under which the appropriation can be used.

Mr. President, in 1905, when we had before us the Indian appropriation bill and were providing for funds for Indian schools, I offered the following amendment:

Provided, however, That the individual owner or beneficiary of any interest in such funds—

That related to Government funds due the Indians—who may desire to educate his ward, child, or children in any school other than a Government school may, by written order signed by him, direct that any portion of the interest accruing to him, or which would be allotted to him on such fund, be paid to the school in which such ward, child, or children may be educated.

Mr. Pettus raised the point of order that the amendment is new legislation on an appropriation bill.

The President pro tempore (Mr. Frye)—

And I think we all agree that he was rather a good presiding officer and fairly well acquainted with the Rules of the Senate—overruled the point of order and said: "It has been held over and over again by the Presiding Officer of the Senate that any amendment is in order where an appropriation is made of funds and it undertakes to distribute the funds in any direction. That was settled a long time ago."

That covers any provision as to how the fund is to be used. If you appropriate for making standards, you have a right to say what standards shall be made or how they shall be made or how they shall be enforced. That is not general legislation, but is legislation upon the particular subject.

Mr. President, I want to hurry, so that I can get a vote on this matter in a very short time. I purpose to offer the following amendment to that particular section——

Mr. STONE. I wish to make a statement to the Senator from North Dakota and to ask him his pleasure in regard to it. I think manifestly we are not going to finish the bill to-night. The discussion the Senator is engaged in will evidently lead to further debate. It is now nearly half past 5 and I should like to move an executive session.

Mr. McCUMBER. For that purpose I will yield, Mr. President, because it is quite evident that the matter which I desire to bring to the attention of the Senate will run us on to 6 o'clock at least, although I desire to get through with it earlier if I can do so.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 13 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 19, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 18, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou, who art from everlasting to everlasting our God, out of whose heart Thou didst give us being and through whose infinite care and loving-kindness Thou dost provide for our every want, temporal and spiritual, may it not be perfunctory, an empty form, which brings us to Thee in prayer as a part of the daily routine of the sessions of this House, but because our hearts longeth for Thee and the touch of Thy spirit that we may fulfill every duty devolving upon us in an earnest desire to serve Thee and build a divine individuality in our souls, passing on day by day to a higher intellectual, moral, and spiritual life. We ask this as seekers after truth. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

CONSTRUCTION OF REVENUE CUTTERS.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, there is a bill on the Speaker's table, S. 4377, in which the Senate has concurred in the House amendment with an amendment. I ask that it be taken from the table, that we disagree to the Senate amendment to the House amendment, and ask for a conference.

Mr. MADDEN. Is that the bill with reference to the construction of revenue cutters?

Mr. ADAMSON. It is.

Mr. MADDEN. A bill with an amendment providing for two revenue cutters instead of four?

Mr. ADAMSON. The Senate agreed to the House amendment by putting back practically the same two ships.

Mr. MADDEN. Would it not be a good idea to have the House vote on the question whether we will have two or four?

Mr. ADAMSON. I should prefer that it go to conference as it is.

Mr. MADDEN. Would the gentleman agree to bring it back without an agreement if the Senate insisted upon four revenue cutters?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not want to make any promises before going into conference. After we get into conference, I will talk with the gentleman about it.

Mr. MADDEN. I want the gentleman from Georgia to understand that I am opposed to the building of four revenue cutters, and the House so indicated when the bill was passed. We ought to have an opportunity to vote on the question whether we are to have four or two. If we have some kind of an understanding about that, I would not object to the bill being taken from the Speaker's table and sent to conference.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not believe that the House ever had any reason to complain of the conferees from our committee.

Mr. MADDEN. I will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the title to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 4377. An act to provide for the construction of two revenue cutters.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to disagree to the Senate amendment to the House amendment and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. ADAMSON, Mr. SIMS, and Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota.

GORDON W. NELSON.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, the bill S. 5552 is on the Speaker's table and a similar House bill reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs is on the House Calendar. I ask unanimous consent to take the Senate bill from the Speaker's table and pass it in lieu of the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to take the bill S. 5552 from the Speaker's table and consider it in lieu of a similar House bill on the calendar. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 5552) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of Gordon W. Nelson, approved May 9, 1914."

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act for the relief of Gordon W. Nelson," approved May 9, 1914, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to commission, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, Gordon W. Nelson an ensign in the United States Navy on the date of his graduation after the four years' course at the Naval Academy, to take rank as an ensign with the other members of his class according to their standing as determined by their final multiples for the four years' course at the Naval Academy: Provided, That unless the said Gordon W. Nelson becomes a citizen of the United States on or before July 1, 1915, he shall on said date cease to be an officer of the Navy."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee to explain what this means.

Mr. PADGETT. On the 9th day of the present month the House passed a bill with the same provisions as this bill contains, except that the date was January 1, 1915. This extends it to July 1, 1915. The young man was born in England. He came here when a boy. He was appointed from New York to the Naval Academy and will graduate this summer. He stands high in his class and is an excellent young man. He can not be commissioned, because he has not been naturalized. He filed his declaration, and the two years' period expires on the 10th of December. When the bill was passed a few days ago it was overlooked that the law requires 90 days after the expiration of 2 years before he can be naturalized. This is simply to extend it to the 1st of July from the 1st of January, so as to allow 90 days.

Mr. MADDEN. It is merely a matter of giving him an opportunity after the requisite time has elapsed to be naturalized?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill is being passed for the education of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, so that that distinguished committee which made the naturalization law will know what it contains. [Laughter.] We passed a law only a few days ago in order to give this young man two years in which to obtain his final papers. The bill that was introduced was a bill to naturalize him, but the Committee on Naturalization, very properly, I think, instead of recommending a bill to naturalize him, recommended a bill authorizing him to be appointed in the Navy when graduated, with the proviso that he should be naturalized by the 1st of January next. The committee did not know that it required more than two years' time from the time of taking out the first papers for naturalization. Possibly it is worth while to take up the time of Congress in passing an amendatory act within two weeks of the passage of the original act in order that we may educate ourselves, and incidentally educate the Committee on Naturalization. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A similar House bill, H. R. 16556, was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. PADGETT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate bill was passed was laid on the table.

MARINE SEA FOOD LIFE.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an interesting and important address on an economic subject by my colleague, Mr. LINTHICUM, of Maryland, delivered in my State.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech made by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

"CUNNINGHAM WILL MATTER."

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday last, when the House had under consideration the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, the question of some kind of a claim made by a man named Cunningham was injected into the proceedings. I made a statement that the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department had considered that matter, and that it had no jurisdiction, and consequently declined to consider it further. I also stated that that decision was based on an opinion rendered by the Solicitor for the State Department. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] asked that I put that opinion in the RECORD. I have it here. I may state, however, that in submitting the proposition as chairman of the committee I submitted it in an interrogatory form, numbering the different interrogatories, and in replying, instead of quoting each question, he referred to them by numbers, and therefore, in order to make it intelligible, I shall be compelled to print my letter to him with his reply. I shall incorporate those in my remarks, unless there is objection to it.

Mr. Speaker, I want to add one word further. My good friend from Washington [Mr. BRYAN], who is also a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, took part in the discussion to which I have referred, and while he did not make any direct criticism of our committee or of anybody else in particular, as far as that is concerned, yet there was running through his remarks a criticism of somebody, somewhere, because this matter had not been considered fully and an investigation had and some relief offered to this man Cunningham, whose brother died in Shanghai, China, leaving an estate, and a will which was probated, and which left all of the property to Cunningham's sister instead of to him. I did not recall all of the facts on Saturday when the matter came up, but, consulting the records of the committee, I find that that very matter was taken up by our committee, and on motion of a member of the committee there was a subcommittee appointed to look into the matter and report. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] was appointed a member of that subcommittee. That subcommittee filed a unanimous report in the following language:

Upon motion of Mr. BROWN the chairman was authorized to appoint a subcommittee of three to look into the "Cunningham will matter" and to report to the full committee their opinion as to whether it was a matter over which the committee has jurisdiction. Which motion being submitted, carried unanimously. Thereupon the chairman appointed on that committee Messrs, BROWN, BORCHERS, and BRYAN.

Subsequently, on July 29, 1913, that subcommittee reported to the full committee as follows:

The subcommittee heretofore appointed by the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, and to which was referred the question of what is known as the "Cunningham matter," have considered the same, and in the light of the information received from the Solicitor of the State Department, letters referring thereto are attached hereto and made a part of this report, informing this committee that our consul in China had probate jurisdiction to settle estates of American citizens dying in that country, we do not believe that the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department has jurisdiction of the said "Cunningham matter," and therefore recommend that the same be laid aside. Believing that we did not have jurisdiction of said matter, your subcommittee did not go into the merits of said case. Whereupon the committee adjourned.

I put that in the RECORD to show that of all persons in the world my good friend from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] is the last man who ought to complain because our committee did not go further into the matter, because he reported that in his opinion we had no jurisdiction of it.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly.

Mr. BRYAN. Is it not a fact that at the time, before the committee, I stated that, jurisdiction or no jurisdiction, the committee ought not to advance that technical idea and thereby prevent a hearing, but that we ought to go on and have a hearing and let that old man submit his testimony and make the matter public?

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I have no recollection of anything like that. I had even forgotten the action of the committee. I will say to the gentleman, until I looked up the record. The record fails to show that the gentleman put any protest of any kind in the record.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman knows there was quite a little controversy, almost friction, over the matter, and then I insisted on something being done; and the gentleman also knows that I could not accomplish anything with the committee, feeling that for want of jurisdiction, want of time, and all of those things, we better not waste any further time.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not know anything of the kind. I will say to the gentleman that I was not a member of the subcommittee at all. I do not know what occurred in the subcommittee. I am only speaking from the record; but I do know of the gentleman, according to the report of the subcommittee, which was unanimous, and I have no recollection——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYAN. Did not the gentleman prepare or have his clerk prepare that report, after a talk at a committee meeting and after a favorable conference, and did not the clerk of the committee prepare that report and put it on file?

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not recall who prepared the report, but I know it was read in the committee room and unanimously adopted.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman will do me the justice to admit that I have insisted on an investigation all the way through.

Mr. HAMLIN. I can not do that, because I do not recall that as being true. I do not say that it is not true, but I have no recollection of it.

Mr. BRYAN. Just one more question. In view of the criminal charges involved, does not the gentleman think they ought to be investigated?

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I will say this in answer to the gentleman: I am really glad that he raised that question. I do not believe that it is the duty of our committee or any other committee of this House to take up for investigation everything that some fellow says to some member of the committee—some indefinite charges made in a general way against anybody and everybody. I think that before a committee of this House should take up any matters and investigate them, somebody of responsibility ought to make definite, specific charges and get behind those charges, and that has not been done in this case. We found, as the record will show, when you come to read the opinion of the Solicitor for the State Department, that we were absolutely without jurisdiction, that this whole proceeding was regular, and we could go no further. And whether there was a forged will there or not is a matter that certainly we could not investigate——

Mr. GARNER. If you did, you could not remedy it.

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly not. We could not possibly settle that. I do not say this old man was treated fairly; I do not know; maybe he was not; but, as a matter of fact, it is beyond the jurisdiction of our committee, and we could not afford to take up our time and engage in a futile, puerile, unnecessary effort to investigate something over which we had no jurisdiction, and the gentleman from Washington conceded we had no jurisdiction in this matter.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to print as part of his remarks the letters to which he referred. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letters are as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES, COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE STATE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., July 23, 1913.

SOLICITOR STATE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: For the information of this committee, in connection with a certain matter which they have under investigation, I respectfully request that you advise me as to the law as follows:

(1) Had the consul general of the United States at Shanghai, China, in 1905, acting judicially, jurisdiction and authority to admit to probate and record a will of a person of American birth, sojourning at Shanghai, and carrying on business in China and other parts of the Orient, and to make final distribution of his estate to the beneficiaries named in the will? If, so, upon what statute or treaty is such jurisdiction based?

(2) If the consul general had the jurisdiction referred to in the foregoing question, by what law would the validity and sufficiency of such will as to form, manner of execution, and witnesses be determined?

(3) If the consul general had jurisdiction in any case to admit a will to probate and to make final distribution of the estate of the testator, would such jurisdiction have reached to the case of a man of American birth with respect to whom the highest court of the State of his birth has decided that he has lost his domicile in such State and that his estate is not subject to administration in the courts thereof, he not having acquired domicile or established residence at any other place, except at Shanghai, China?

Thanking you in advance, I beg to remain,

Very respectfully,

C. W. HAMLIN,
Chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 24, 1913.

Hon. C. W. HAMLIN,
Chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of July 23, and in response to the questions propounded therein to answer as follows:

(1) Yes. I inclose a copy of the decision of the United States court for China in the matter of the probate of the will of John Pratt Roberts, which fully quotes the provisions of the treaty and statutes on which such jurisdiction is based.

(2) The common law. See decision referred to above.

(3) Yes. I respectfully refer you to the decision of the Supreme Court of Maine, reported in Seventy-fourth Atlantic Reporter, 809; volume 3, American Journal of International Law, page 752, in which that court held that the decedent had a domicile in Shanghai (1) as a matter of fact and (2) as a matter of law. In this case the appellees had denied the right of the consular court at Shanghai to settle and distribute the estate of the decedent upon the ground that he had never acquired a domicile in Shanghai. The effect of the said decision of the Maine Supreme Court was to uphold the administration of the estate in the consular court at Shanghai.

In addition, I may observe that section 55 of the regulations in force in the consular courts of the United States in China, promulgated in pursuance of the laws of the United States (sec. 4117, Rev. Stats.), provides as follows:

"Until promulgation of further regulations, consuls will continue to exercise their former lawful jurisdiction and authority in * * * probate of wills, administration of estates, and other matters of equity, admiralty, ecclesiastical, and common law, not specially provided for in previous decrees, according to such reasonable rules, not repugnant to the Constitution, treaties, and laws of the United States, as they may find necessary or convenient to adopt."

Paragraph 416 of the United States Consular Regulations reads as follows:

"In China * * * and other non-Christian countries the property of decedents, both personal and real, is administered under the probate jurisdiction of the consular courts in those countries without interference in any respect by the local governments."

Very respectfully,

F. VAN DYNE,
Acting Solicitor.

UNANIMOUS CONSENT CALENDAR.

The SPEAKER. This is unanimous-consent day, and the Clerk will report the first bill.

AMENDMENT TO RIVER AND HARBOR ACT.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 14331) to amend section 19 of an act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1899.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, after a conference with the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, I ask unanimous consent that that bill be postponed until next unanimous-consent day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed without prejudice.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am going to object to the bill. I think it has no place on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. It is a question that ought to be considered entirely by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in every case that comes up. There ought not to be any permanent law directing the Committee on Rivers and Harbors as to what it ought to do when a question comes before it, and I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. WATKINS. Will the gentleman from Illinois be kind enough to reserve his right to object?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois object to the postponing?

Mr. MADDEN. I object to that.

Mr. WATKINS. Will the gentleman be kind enough to defer——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects both to the bill and to the postponing.

Mr. MADDEN. I will reserve the right to object if the gentleman wants to say something.

Mr. WATKINS. I would like to make a statement. I wish to say that there is no intention whatever to usurp the prerogatives of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and as soon as I ascertained that the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors thought that the Rivers and Harbors Committee should have jurisdiction of the bill I at once asked that it be transferred from the calendar to the Rivers and Harbors Committee—that is, from the Committee on Revision of the Laws to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors—and objection was made and it could not be transferred over that objection. It was alleged that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce had jurisdiction and we left it on the calendar. It is simply pending now for the purpose of adjusting, if we can, the differences that may exist as to the question of jurisdiction, and there is not any purpose to force the matter until we get an understanding——

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, well, if that is the case, I have no objection to it going over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned, I should object at any and all times to the consideration of this bill. I have no objection personally, however, to the gentleman's request that it go over without prejudice, but if at any time I am here when this bill comes up I shall object to it. I thought I ought to say that to the House and the gentleman.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield? What is the object in carrying over a bill where a Member states positively under no condition can it be considered by unanimous consent?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I can not see myself——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the only thing the bill does is to dispose of in a way logs and merchantable timber that are in navigable streams. That is a matter over which the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has no jurisdiction. It is a matter over which the Committee on the Revision of the Laws has no jurisdiction under the rules of the House. It is a matter of obstruction to navigation and belongs to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. If we intend to keep this bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, I suggest to the gentleman from Louisiana, until they settle the question of jurisdiction it will be long after this Congress has expired, and I see no object in passing it over, so I object to passing it over.

Mr. WATKINS. I wish to say to the gentleman from Illinois, if he will permit, that I do not care whether it goes to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce or goes to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, or whether it stays where it is now, so we can get consideration of the bill at this session of Congress. We have $500,000 worth of logs and timber in a navigable stream that can not be utilized which can be put into cash and utilized if we can get this bill passed.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. GARNER. May I suggest to the gentleman from Louisiana that he introduce his bill over again and send it to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, that has jurisdiction of it, and if they have jurisdiction let them report it and let it go on the Unanimous Consent Calendar and come up for consideration?

Mr. WATKINS. It may be transferred right now, as far as I am concerned, just so we take some action.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I shall object to it going to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. It is not going there now; the question is whether you are going to pass this bill over without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I shall object, unless some one wishes——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. MANN. The bill has not been disposed of yet, Mr. Speaker. I objected to its passing over.

The SPEAKER. Well, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] objected to considering it, so there you are.

Mr. MANN. I am perfectly willing, if that is the way.

IMMIGRATION STATION AT BALTIMORE, MD.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11625) to increase the appropriation for the erection of an immigration station at Baltimore, Md.

Mr. COADY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move that this bill be passed without prejudice.

Mr. FOSTER. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. It has not been reported yet. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read in full.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COADY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to renew my request to have this bill passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. I think the time has come when this bill ought to be disposed of by enactment into law or ought to be taken off the Unanimous Consent Calendar. It never can be passed by unanimous consent, because I propose to object to it when it comes up for consideration as a unanimous-consent proposition. So I desire to object now to its going over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and that is the end of it. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CONSOLIDATION OF INDIAN FUNDS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10835) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to consolidate sundry funds from which unpaid Indian annuities or shares in the tribal trust funds are or may hereafter be due.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to transfer upon the books of the Treasury any unpaid and noninterest-bearing annuity or per capita share or shares of any Indian, whether derived from a gratuity appropriation or from the principal of or the interest on any tribal or trust fund of his tribe from the caption or fund under which the share or annuity accrued and became due and unpaid at any time prior to the passage of this act, or which may hereafter accrue and become due and unpaid, to a common fund to be known as "Indian moneys, unpaid per capita shares, noninterest," to the credit of the individual Indian entitled thereto, and thereafter such annuity or share shall be paid direct from said common fund without further appropriation therefor by Congress, the amounts so transferred, whether previously covered into the surplus fund or not, being hereby permanently appropriated for that purpose: Provided, That no such transfer shall be made except upon the certificate of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, showing the shares due and unpaid and the names of the Indians entitled thereto, and upon settlement of the account by the Auditor for the Interior Department.

SEC. 2. That the unpaid shares which bear the same rate of interest, payable at the same intervals, of all Indians in the funds above described, may in the same manner as hereinbefore provided be consolidated under such title as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and thereafter payments shall be made from the common funds so created without further appropriation by Congress therefor, the amounts so transferred and the interest thereon being hereby permanently appropriated for that purpose.

SEC. 3. That the consolidation and transfers herein provided for shall not be construed to repeal that part of section 1 of the act approved June 21, 1906 (34 Stat. L., p. 327), making provision for the payment of interest on minors' shares retained in the Treasury.

SEC. 4. That any and all annuities or shares transferred in accordance with the provisions of the foregoing sections, together with any interest which may accrue thereon, shall be paid to the party entitled thereto by settlement of an account and the issuance of a warrant in his favor according to the practice in other cases of authorized and liquidated claims against the United States: Provided, That the determination by the Secretary of the Interior of the heirs of any deceased Indian, to whose credit any annuities or shares may have been transferred in accordance with this act, shall be deemed final.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Amend the bill by striking out the period at the end of line 15, page 3, and adding the following: "except in cases where the estate of the deceased Indian is being legally probated and the probate court having jurisdiction is determining, or has determined, the legal heirs of such deceased Indian: Provided further, That if any person whose share is transferred to the common fund as herein provided is found subsequently not entitled to the same, such share shall revert to the tribe and shall be transferred to the tribal funds upon the recommendation of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and certification by the Auditor for the Interior Department."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] asks unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAYDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT TO INDIAN DEPREDATIONS ACT.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 22) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the adjudication and payment of claims arising from Indian depredations," approved March 3, 1891.

The bill was read in full.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar. The Clerk will report the next bill.

POST-OFFICE BUILDING, NEWCASTLE, IND.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11317) to increase the limit of cost of the United States post-office building at Newcastle, Ind.

The bill was read in full.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to inquire of the gentleman in charge of this bill how large a village Newcastle, Ind., is?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, when the Unanimous Consent Calendar was last considered I asked that this bill might go over on account of the absence of the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. GRAY, but he is not here at this time.

Mr. MONDELL. Has the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] any information in the matter so that he can answer my question?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not desire to go into a discussion of it in the absence of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] that he read the report in order to secure the information.

Mr. MONDELL. I have read the report, and it contains no information whatever.

Mr. FOSTER. Will not the gentleman allow this bill to go over until the next time?

Mr. MONDELL. I should like information in regard to the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. We will try to have the information when the Unanimous Consent Calendar is again considered.

Mr. MANN. My colleague knows that when this bill was passed over before, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY], whom we all regard so highly, was out attending to the matter of being renominated.

Mr. FOSTER. That is very important to him and the people of his district.

Mr. MANN. Now, he has been renominated, and I should think he would be making an effort to be reelected by being on hand here.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this bill go over.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] asks that this bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the next bill.

IOWA TRIBE OF INDIANS IN OKLAHOMA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13519) for the relief of the Iowa Indians of Oklahoma.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, what is the object in passing this bill over without prejudice? Why not get some of these bills out of the way?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. The object is to get it rereferred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MANN. Have it referred now.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I want to state to the gentleman that possibly it would go off of its own force. I know what that would mean. It would put it at the foot of the calendar.

Mr. MANN. No. That does not put it at the foot of the calendar. I think I know what the gentleman wants to do, and I have no objection to that. We ought to get some of these bills from the top of the calendar, because when they come up they take a lot of time. We are following a very bad practice of passing over bills from time to time at the head of the calendar, and it takes up time when they come up. Now, the gentleman knows he can not pass this bill by unanimous consent, and does not intend to try it.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. No. In truth, I expect to pass a resolution.

Mr. MANN. I understand. So I do not see the object of keeping the bill on the calendar. It will take 10 minutes on the next day, probably.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Does not the gentleman realize that it would not hurt anything if it went off later?

Mr. MANN. I think it ought to go off the calendar. It does not prejudice any of the gentleman's rights.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Very well. Let it go off the calendar.

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. It will go off the calendar, then. The Clerk will report the next bill.

PAYMENTS UNDER RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 4628) extending the period of payment under the reclamation projects, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person whose lands hereafter become subject to the terms and conditions of the act approved June 17, 1902, entitled "An act appropriating the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain States and Territories to the construction of irrigation works for the reclamation of arid lands," and acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, hereafter to be referred to as the reclamation law, and any person who hereafter makes entry thereunder shall at the time of making water-right application or entry, as the case may be, pay into the reclamation fund 5 per cent of the construction charge fixed for his land as an initial installment, and shall pay the balance of said charge in 15 annual installments, the first 5 of which shall be 5 per cent of the construction charge and the remainder 7 per cent until the whole amount shall have been paid. The first of the annual installments shall become due and payable on December 1 of the fifth calendar year after the initial installment: Provided, That any water-right applicant or entryman may, if he so elects, pay the whole or any part of the construction charges owing by him within any shorter period.

ACT SHALL APPLY TO EXISTING PROJECTS.

SEC. 2. That any person whose land or entry has heretofore become subject to the terms and conditions of the reclamation law shall pay the construction charge in 20 annual installments, the first of which shall become due and payable on December 1 of the year in which the public notice affecting his land is issued under this act, and subsequent installments on December 1 of each year thereafter. The first 4 of such installments shall each be 2 per cent, the next 2 installments shall each be 4 per cent, and the next 14 each 6 per cent of the total construction charge or the portion of the construction charge unpaid at the beginning of such installments.

PENALTIES.

SEC. 3. That if any water-right applicant or entryman shall fail to pay any installment of his construction charges when due, there shall be added to the amount unpaid a penalty of 1 per cent thereof, and there shall be added a like penalty of 1 per cent of the amount unpaid on the first day of each month thereafter so long as such default shall continue. If any such applicant or entryman shall be one year in default in the payment of any installment of the construction charges and penalties, or any part thereof, his water-right application, and if he be a homestead entryman his entry also, shall be subject to cancellation, and all payments made by him forfeited to the reclamation fund: Provided, That if the Secretary of the Interior shall so elect, he may cause suit or action to be brought for the recovery of the amount in default and penalties; but if suit or action be brought, the right to declare a cancellation and forfeiture shall be suspended pending such suit or action.

INCREASE OF CHARGES.

SEC. 4. That no increase in the construction charges shall hereafter be made, after the same have been fixed by public notice, except by agreement between the Secretary of the Interior and a majority of the water-right applicants and entrymen to be affected by such increase, whereupon all water-right applicants and entrymen in the area proposed to be affected by the increased charge shall become subject thereto. Such increased charge shall be added to the construction charge and payment thereof distributed over the remaining unpaid installments of construction charges.

OPERATION AND MAINTENANCE.

SEC. 5. That in addition to the annual construction charges, every water-right applicant, entryman, or landowner under or upon a reclamation project shall also pay, whenever water service is available for the irrigation of his land, an operation and maintenance charge based upon the total cost of operation and maintenance of the project, or each separate unit thereof, and such charge shall be made for each acre-foot of water delivered; but each acre of irrigable land, whether irrigated or not, shall be charged with a minimum maintenance and operation charge based upon the charge for delivery of not less than 1 acre-foot of water: Provided, That, whenever any legally organized water users' association or irrigation district shall so request, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to transfer to such water users' association or irrigation district the care, operation, and maintenance of all or any part of the project works, subject to such rules and regulations as he may prescribe. If the total amount of operation and maintenance charges and penalties collected for any one irrigation season on any project shall exceed the cost of operation and maintenance of the project during that irrigation season, the balance shall be applied to a reduction of the charge on the project for the next irrigation season, and any deficit incurred may likewise be added to the charge for the next irrigation season.

PENALTIES.

SEC. 6. That all operation and maintenance charges shall become due and payable on the date fixed for each project by the Secretary of the Interior, and if such charge is paid on or before the date when due there shall be a discount of 5 per cent of such charge; but if such charge is unpaid on the first day of the third calendar month thereafter, a penalty of 1 per cent of the amount unpaid shall be added thereto, and thereafter an additional penalty of 1 per cent of the amount unpaid shall be added on the first day of each calendar month if such charge and penalties shall remain unpaid, and no water shall be delivered to the lands of any water-right applicant or entryman who shall be in arrears for more than one calendar year for the payment of any charge for operation and maintenance, or any annual construction charge and penalties. If any water-right applicant or entryman shall be one year in default in the payment of any charge for operation and maintenance and penalties, or any part thereof, his water-right application, and if he be a homestead entryman his entry also, shall be subject to cancellation, and all payments made by him forfeited to the reclamation fund. In the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior suit or action may be brought for the amounts in default and penalties in like manner as provided in section 3 of this act.

FISCAL AGENT.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to designate and appoint, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, the legally organized water users' association or irrigation district, under any reclamation project, as the fiscal agent of the United States to collect the annual payments on the construction charge of the project and the annual charges for operation and maintenance and all penalties: Provided, That no water-right applicant or entryman shall be entitled to credit for any payment thus made until the same shall have been paid over to an officer designated by the Secretary of the Interior to receive the same.

RECLAMATION REQUIREMENTS.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make rules and regulations governing the irrigation of the lands within any project, and may require the reclamation for agricultural purposes and the cultivation of one-half the irrigable area under each water-right application or entry within three full irrigation seasons after the filing of water-right application or entry, and the reclamation for agricultural purposes and the cultivation of three-fourths the irrigable area within five full irrigation seasons after the filing of the water-right application or entry, and shall provide for continued compliance with such requirements. Failure on the part of any water-right applicant or entryman to comply with such requirements shall render his application or entry subject to cancellation.

LANDS NOT SUBJECT TO RECLAMATION ACT.

SEC. 9. That in all cases where application for water right for lands in private ownership or lands held under entries not subject to the reclamation law shall not be made within one year after the passage of this act, or within one year after notice issued in pursuance of section 4 of the reclamation act, in cases where such notice has not heretofore been issued, the construction charges for such land shall be increased 5 per cent each year until such application is made and an initial installment is paid.

WITHDRAWN LANDS SUBJECT TO ENTRY.

SEC. 10. That the act of Congress approved February 18, 1911, entitled "An act to amend section 5 of the act of Congress of June 25, 1910, entitled 'An act to authorize advances to the reclamation fund and for the issuance and disposal of certificates of indebtedness in reimbursement therefor, and for other purposes,'" be, and the same hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That no entry shall be hereafter made and no entryman shall be permitted to go upon lands reserved for irrigation purposes until the Secretary of the Interior shall have established the unit of acreage per entry and water is ready to be delivered for the land in such unit or some part thereof and such fact has been announced by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That where entries made prior to June 25, 1910, have been or may be relinquished, in whole or in part, the lands so relinquished shall be subject to settlement and entry under the reclamation law."

WATER SERVICE.

SEC. 11. That whenever water is available and it is impracticable to apportion operation and maintenance charges as provided in section 5 of this act the Secretary of the Interior may, prior to giving public notice of the construction charge per acre upon land under any project, furnish water to any entryman or private landowner thereunder until such notice is given, making a reasonable charge therefor, and such charges shall be subject to the same penalties and to the provisions for cancellation and collection as herein provided for other operation and maintenance charges.

ADMISSION OF PRIVATE LANDOWNERS TO NEW PROJECTS.

SEC. 12. That before any contract is let or work begun for the construction of any reclamation project hereafter adopted the Secretary of the Interior shall require the owners of private lands thereunder to agree to dispose of all lands in excess of the area which he shall deem sufficient for the support of a family upon the land in question, upon such terms and not to exceed such price as the Secretary of the Interior may designate; and if any landowner shall refuse to agree to the requirements fixed by the Secretary of the Interior his land shall not be included within the project if adopted for construction.

DISPOSITION OF EXCESS FARM UNITS.

SEC. 13. That all entries under reclamation projects containing more than one farm unit shall be reduced in area and conformed to a single farm unit within two years after making proof of residence, improvement, and cultivation, or within two years after the issuance of a farm-unit plat for the project, if the same issues subsequent to the making of such proof: Provided, That such proof is made within four years from the date as announced by the Secretary of the Interior that water is available for delivery to the land. Any entryman failing within the period herein provided to dispose of the excess of his entry above one farm unit in the manner provided by law and to conform his entry to a single farm unit shall render his entry subject to cancellation as to the excess above one farm unit: Provided, That upon compliance with the provisions of law such entryman shall be entitled to receive a patent for that part of his entry which conforms to one farm unit as established for the project: Provided further, That no person shall hold by assignment more than one farm unit prior to final payment of all charges for all the land held by him subject to the reclamation law, except operation and maintenance charges not then due.

ACCEPTANCE OF THIS ACT.

SEC. 14. That any person whose land or entry has heretofore become subject to the reclamation law, who desires to secure the benefits of the extension of the period of payments provided by this act, shall, within six months after the issuance of the first public notice hereunder affecting his land or entry, notify the Secretary of the Interior, in the manner to be prescribed by said Secretary, of his acceptance of all of the terms and conditions of this act, and thereafter his lands or entry shall be subject to all of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 15. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to perform any and all acts and to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into full force and effect.

With committee amendments, as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 12, by inserting the following: "Provided further, That entry may be made whenever water is available, and the initial payment be made when the charge per acre is established."

Amend, page 2, line 19, by inserting the following: "or the portion of the construction charge remaining unpaid."

Amend, page 3, lines 3 and 4, by striking out, after the word "charge" in line 3, the words "or the portion of the construction charge unpaid at the beginning of such installments."

And such additional installments of the increased construction charge, as so agreed upon, shall become due and payable on December 1 of each year subsequent to the year when the final installment of the construction charge under such public notice is due and payable: Provided further, That all such increased construction charges shall be subject to the same conditions, penalties, and suit or action as provided in section 3 of this act."

Amend, page 4, line 23, by striking out the word "annual."

Amend, page 4, line 24, by striking out the word "charges" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "charge."

Amend, page 7, line 16, by striking out the word "one-half" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "one-fourth."

Amend, page 7, line 20, by striking out the word "three-fourths" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "one-half."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, personally I do not believe this is a bill that ought to pass under unanimous consent.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, this is only unanimous consent to consider it. We are not asking to have it passed by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BORLAND. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] if he is willing to allow the bill to remain on the calendar and retain its place and pass it over for the present?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, may I suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that this is a bill reported by my colleague from Texas [Mr. SMITH], and he suggested that when the matter was called up there would be a number of gentlemen on the floor who thoroughly understand the matter. He has informed me that it has had the consideration not only of the House committee but also of the Senate committee and that of the Interior Department, and a number of gentlemen who understand the subject thoroughly, and that it is of vital importance to the arid West, where these irrigation projects have started, that this bill should become a law. Of course, Texas has no interest in this matter whatever. We have no public lands in my State, and my colleague, simply as chairman of that committee, reported the bill in order to give relief to the farmers of the arid West, who are unable to meet the payments due within the 10 years' limit. If I understand the purport of this bill, it is, in substance, to extend the time of payment from 10 years to 20 years, still giving the Government the same lien and the same rights. There is no possible chance for the Government to lose anything by the passage of this bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. GARNER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says that this bill, or the House bill, was reported by his colleague from Texas; that it is very important that it should have consideration, and I agree with him about that. He has another colleague from Texas, I believe, who will have it quite in his power to bring this bill up for consideration in the House by report'ng a rule for its consideration. Am I correct about that?

Mr. GARNER. Well, the gentleman from Illinois is possibly in error. I presume he refers to my colleague the chairman of the Committee on Rules [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. MANN. I do, indeed.

Mr. GARNER. I never have understood that the chairman of the Committee on Rules undertook to say that he could control the committee.

Mr. MANN. Oh, he does not say that; but everybody else knows that.

Mr. GARNER. He is quite influential on that committee, no doubt, and might be induced to ask the committee to report out a rule, as the gentleman indicates, if the gentleman from Illinois did not know that under the present conditions there will be but one rule or—and I am not speaking advisedly—at least three rules within the reasonable time allowed to carry out the administration's program.

Mr. MONDELL. Is that all?

Mr. GARNER. For the present, I said.

Mr. MANN. You know we passed three bills in a week under a rule.

Mr. GARNER. I understand that. But the gentleman from Illinois is thoroughly familiar with the provisions and merits of this bill, and I am certain that in his own consciousness he realizes that this bill or some bill similar to it ought to become a law.

Mr. MANN. I agree with the gentleman, and that is the reason why I am calling his attention to the way in which it can be brought before the House.

Mr. GARNER. Here is an opportunity for meritorious legislation in behalf of the farmer, and I appeal to the gentleman from Illinois and others to give the House an opportunity to consider this bill.

Mr. MANN. I appeal to the gentleman from Texas to bring his strong influence to bear upon his colleague from Texas [Mr. HENRY], now the Pooh-Bah of the House in reference to legislation, to bring in a rule to give us a chance to consider this bill.

Mr. GARNER. If it is a meritorious bill, what is the object of having a rule when we can consider it by unanimous consent?

Mr. BORLAND. I will tell the gentleman. I have let him occupy some of my time. I will tell him that there are a great many men in this House interested in this Unanimous Consent Calendar, and if this bill is of the importance he says it is—and I think it is—it will take a great portion of the day, if not the whole day, and in my judgment it does not properly belong on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent at all. Now, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], who is the second member on this Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, the vice chairman under the gentleman's colleague, is here, and asking to let the bill go over. I have no objection to that. I think it is fair to the House to have that done.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Texas is not entirely accurate in his statement. He says Texas has no interest in the bill. Texas has a very considerable interest in the bill, for while Texas has contributed nothing to the reclamation fund, yet Texas by an act passed some years ago became a beneficiary under the fund, and the people of Texas receive extensions of time for the payments on their construction charges under this bill just as people under other reclamation projects do.

Now, let me suggest to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] that this bill has been very carefully considered. It is an important bill, but it is not a particularly complicated matter. The gentleman knows that through what has been denominated on that side as a "pussy-footed filibuster" Calendar Wednesday business has been blocked. Otherwise this bill would be up for consideration the coming Wednesday.

As matters now stand, the caucus having decided on a program and this bill not being included in the program, unless there shall be a change of heart on that side, followed by other caucus action, the only way in which this bill can be passed is by unanimous consent. The bill can be just as thoroughly considered now as at any time, and the gentleman knows, because he has been investigating this matter, that there are thousands of people on these projects who have reached the time when their payments are due and they must have some relief. That relief is granted in this bill.

The bill is not only important because it grants relief by an extension of time, but it is important because it contains considerable legislation which is necessary to round out and complete the national reclamation law and to make clear some things which are now ambiguous.

Mr. BORLAND. What the gentleman has said simply confirms what I said a moment ago, that this bill can not be considered on the Unanimous Consent Calendar without taking substantially all day, or a great portion of it, to the exclusion of other business.

But I do not agree with the statement the gentleman makes as to the urgent necessity of this bill. The gentleman knows that the existing condition in the Reclamation Service has been going on for five years, and so far as we know the condition is the same as it was two or three years ago at least. Some measures must be taken to reclaim the Reclamation Service. This bill may have some tendency to that effect, but it is going to reorganize the whole service. It is going to be a matter that a good many men will want to discuss in debate, and it can not be done on a unanimous-consent day. What the gentleman has said simply confirms that.

Mr. MONDELL. The difficulty is that unless it is done on a unanimous-consent day this legislation probably can not be enacted during this session.

Mr. BORLAND. No; I will say to the gentleman that at the suggestion of the Secretary of the Interior I inquired of the Democratic leader whether it would not be possible during this session to have a day for suspension of the rules, and whether that would not be a more appropriate time to take up a bill of this character, and it was conceded that it would be.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is kind-hearted enough to run us up against a two-thirds vote on this legislation.

Mr. BORLAND. You are up against a unanimous vote now.

Mr. MONDELL. If the best the gentleman promises is that we may get an opportunity to consider this bill providing we can get a two-thirds majority for it, his promise does not amount to very much. Furthermore, the gentleman talks about the importance of the legislation, about the various important questions that it raises, and yet his proposition is now that we shall be required to secure a two-thirds majority for it after 20 minutes of debate and no opportunity for amendment. Of course, the gentleman must realize that there is no hope for the passage of the bill in that way. A number of gentlemen who are not opposed to the general provisions of the bill desire to offer amendments to it. No doubt the gentleman from Missouri does, and that can not be done under suspension of the rules. In effect, therefore, the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri leaves us without hope. Give us a chance to take the bill up now and it can be discussed and passed.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] has given this matter some consideration, has he not?

Mr. BORLAND. I have given it some thought and consideration.

Mr. RAKER. May I call attention to the fact that for at least two months the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the heads of the Reclamation Service, Mr. Newell, Mr. Davis, Mr. Ryan, Mr. King, and others, and practically all of the Representatives from the Western States, as well as those where there are reclamation projects, met day after day and went over this bill in all of its phases; and I do not believe there is any bill that ever came before this Congress that was given more thorough and painstaking consideration than this bill. It was then reported to the Senate and House, and hearings again had. No objections were made. The President has gone over this legislation, has gone over the facts that necessitated it, and after his investigation he is very earnest in the hope that this bill will be passed. We have received telegrams from these various projects, urging that this bill be passed, to the end that a change be made, so that it will be workable, and that every dollar that has been expended or will be expended by the Government will be returned to the Treasury of the United States. With all this behind it, with this investigation, I plead with the gentleman from Missouri not to object. As I understand, the President is anxious that this bill pass, and I trust the gentleman will not object to the consideration of the bill. It is a meritorious matter, and I will say to the gentleman that many times I have appeared with the other Members of the House and Members of the Senate, sometimes 30 or 40, who have appeared at the Secretary's office and gone over this bill. Then we would go back again and again in a few days. The President has gone over every phase of this bill, and urges that this legislation be passed. The Secretary of the Interior is very desirous that this legislation become a law. This bill should be considered without delay by this House. It is important to the settlers now on these projects.

Mr. BORLAND. Let me interrupt the gentleman right there——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I ask unanimous consent that the bill retain its place on the calendar and be passed over.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks that the bill retain its place on the calendar and be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DRAINAGE CONGRESS, SAVANNAH, GA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10078) authorizing the Secretary of State to invite other nations of the world to participate in the Drainage Congress to be held at Savannah, Ga., in 1914, and to appropriate $10,000 to help defray the expenses thereof.

The Clerk read the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that this congress has been held.

Mr. HARRISON. It has been held, and there is no objection to the bill being stricken from the calendar.

Mr. MANN. There is absolutely no information in the report, anyhow.

Mr. HARRISON. The information was given to the congress when it was held.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi say the congress has been held?

Mr. HARRISON. The congress was held in April.

Mr. STAFFORD. The information was given in the newspapers at the time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The bill will be stricken from the calendar.

RELIEF OF LANDOWNERS IN MISSISSIPPI.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13581) for the relief of the landowners on the east bank of the Mississippi River, in the counties of Warren, Claiborne, Jefferson, Adams, and Wilkinson, in the State of Mississippi, and the parish of West Feliciana, State of Louisiana.

The Clerk read the bill at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill by my colleague, Mr. QUIN, who is unavoidably detained by reason of a visit as a member of the Subcommittee on Military Affairs to New York. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his objection and let the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request that the bill be passed without prejudice?

There was no objection.

LOCATORS OF OIL AND GAS ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

The next bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 15469) to amend an act entitled "An act to protect the locators in good faith of oil and gas lands who shall have effected an actual discovery of oil or gas on the public lands of the United States, or their successors in interest," approved March 2, 1911.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act to protect the locators in good faith of oil and gas lands who shall have effected an actual discovery of oil or gas on the public lands of the United States, or their successors in interest," approved March 2, 1911, be amended by adding thereto the following section:

"SEC. 2. That where applications for patents have been or may hereafter be offered for any oil or gas land included in an order of withdrawal upon which oil or gas has heretofore been discovered, or is being produced, or upon which drilling operations are in actual progress at the date of the passage of this act, and oil or gas is thereafter discovered thereon, and where there has been no final determination by the Secretary of the Interior upon such applications for patent, said Secretary, in his discretion, may enter into agreements, under such conditions as he may prescribe with such applicants for patents in possession of such land or any portions thereof, relative to the disposition of the oil or gas produced therefrom or the proceeds thereof, pending final determination of the title thereto by the Secretary of the Interior, or such other disposition of the same as may be authorized by law."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FINLEY. I object.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman reserve his objection and hear some explanation of the bill?

Mr. FINLEY. I will reserve the objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, in the State of California for a number of years applicants for title under the placer-mining law have been proceeding with the drilling for oil. Some have proceeded regularly and some have proceeded irregularly. In their strife for patents much delay has been brought about; also much complication in procedure. The situation that becomes acute is from the fact that the pipe-line people are refusing to take their oil on the theory that their patents or titles are not good, that the patents have not been issued, and the titles are at least in question. So they have in many instances had to shut down their oil wells, and it has brought about a stagnation in the field. It is an acute situation that needs attention now. The Committee on Public Lands heard gentlemen for a week or 10 days at a time, and 25 or 30 oil men from California came before the committee. The Secretary of the Interior detailed a lawyer, and they also had Mr. Smith, of the Geological Survey, to sit with the committee and try to find out and ascertain, if possible, what could be done to help out the situation locally. Two things seem to the committee to be important. One was that the wells of these independent producers, pending the time when it was determinable whether or not they had title to the lands, should not be destroyed by allowing the water to break in. Second, not to do anything more than to grant power to the Secretary of the Interior to bring about a working arrangement whereby the wells might be developed and retain within his control a sufficient amount of oil pending the time when they could determine whether the title was good or not. The situation is a peculiarly acute one, and the Secretary of the Interior has written a strong letter on it. The committee brought in unanimously this measure for providing for relief. It involves the whole west side of the San Joaquin Valley of California—125 miles long and 3 or 4 miles wide. This is a temporary relief measure that is needed badly not only for the protection of the rights of the applicants but the Government as well.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand that there are some contests pending in the Land Office about some companies connected with the Standard Oil Co. concerning lands in Wyoming. Would this bill apply to them?

Mr. FERRIS. The bill is peculiarly for California, as I recall it. The act of March 2, 1911, was a bill introduced by Representative Smith of California, and that bill applied to this same situation. The oil men are struggling for patents. I may be in error as to this being a special or local here, but, anyway, the demand was local and local to California.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why should there not be general legislation on it? Why should it be special? I know of a certain case in Wyoming where the Government is contesting the right of private oil companies, presumably the Standard Oil Co., to their location.

Mr. FERRIS. If the gentleman feels that it ought to be amended, we can do it. It seemed to the committee that this situation was peculiarly acute in California and needed the attention of Congress.

Mr. STAFFORD. But there are other oil lands in other parts of the United States besides California.

Mr. FERRIS. The situation is more acute in California than in the rest of the country.

Mr. MANN. Why would not this bill apply to the Southern Pacific?

Mr. FERRIS. Because in a grant to the Southern Pacific, given years ago, there was a provision which intended to reserve the minerals and oil, and I hope that when it is finally determined it will be held to do so.

Mr. MANN. Do not they make application to the Government for grants?

Mr. FERRIS. They have the patents; it is a question whether the grant in presenti carried with it the oil, gas, and mineral under the surface. I hope the reservation is sufficient to retain it in the Federal Government. But that is a question to be litigated. They have the patent already.

Mr. MANN. I am not at all convinced that this does not apply to it.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman from California [Mr. CHURCH] tells me that the Southern Pacific already have their patents. It is not a question of location under the placer law, but a question of the construction as to what the grant made years and years ago was.

Mr. MANN. This is not a location under the placer law either. This is where applicants for patents have been or may hereafter be filed for any oil or gas lands.

Mr. FERRIS. The Southern Pacific lands are already patented.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Has the gentleman any objection to adding, after the word "patent," in line 1, the words "under the placer-mining act"?

Mr. FERRIS. Not at all. That is what we want to do. There is no effort on the part of the committee or on the part of any member of the committee or anybody else to make it apply to any other than those men who are trying in good faith to get patents under the placer-mining law.

Mr. MANN. Why does not the department determine the rights of these people as to their patents?

Mr. FERRIS. I am glad the gentleman has asked that question. We brought before us the Commissioner of the General Land Office. He came with amazing frankness, and said that the Land Office could not pass on the many cases for want of appropriations.

Mr. MANN. That excuse is too flimsy for anybody to present, and I am sure the gentleman himself would not have originated it.

Mr. FERRIS. It is not a flimsy excuse to the man who is out in the field and can not get his rights passed on. I desire to print herein the report, No. 519, which contains a letter from the department on the subject.

[House Report No. 519, Sixty-third Congress, second session.]

LOCATORS OF OIL AND GAS ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

Mr. FERRIS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, submitted the following report, to accompany H. R. 15469:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred H. R. 15469, by Mr. CHURCH, amending an act entitled "An act to protect the locators in good faith of oil and gas lands who shall have effected an actual discovery of oil or gas on the public lands of the United States, or their successors in interest," approved March 2, 1911, beg leave to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The bill was referred to the department, and the department has reported on the same, and it is thought that the entire letter will be of value in the consideration of the bill by the House.

The report thereon is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, April 10, 1914.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. FERRIS: I am in receipt of your request for report and recommendation upon H. R. 15469, a bill to amend the act of Congress approved March 2, 1911 (36 Stat., 1015). The amendment proposed is the addition of a section which will authorize the Secretary of the Interior to enter into agreements, under such conditions as he may prescribe, with parties who have presented or may present applications for patent for oil or gas land included in an order of withdrawal and upon which oil or gas has been discovered, is being produced, or upon which drilling operations shall be in actual progress at the date of the passage of the act, said agreements to relate to the disposition of the oil or gas produced from the lands, or the proceeds thereof, pending final determination by the Secretary of the Interior of the validity of the offered applications for patents.

The proposed legislation is peculiarly applicable to the California oil fields, where a large number of locations and applications are under investigation or involved in proceedings which challenge the validity of the locations or the regularity of the applications presented. Many oil and gas wells are in actual operation upon these and adjacent lands, and by reason of the investigations of the department and certain suits instituted by the United States to enjoin parties from removing oil from the lands, the operators are unable to dispose of the oil or gas under existing laws pending adjudication of their claims. This is disadvantageous not only to the operators, but to the United States, because the failure to continuously operate the wells may result in the diminution or destruction of the oil or gas values through introduction of water into the wells or by reason of the draining of the oil and gas deposits from under the lands involved through wells sunk and in operation upon adjacent patented lands. The situation is one which demands immediate attention if the operators and the United States are to be saved from large and irreparable loss, and I earnestly recommend the enactment of the bill. At the same time I desire to point out that this bill gives temporary relief only, in that it permits of adjustments which will permit of the operation of oil and gas wells and take care of the proceeds pending the final adjudication of the claims by the department. It does not provide a method for disposing of the lands or the deposits after final adjudication of the cases if the claims of the applicants be finally denied. Relief for the latter situation may, however, be provided later.

I understand the present bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to enter into agreement with the record claimant to all or any part of a location, provided such record claimant has presented or shall present an application for patent for all or any portion of the location involved.

I further direct attention to the general bill providing for the leasing of lands containing deposits of oil, gas, and certain other minerals now pending before your committee, and to the similar measure, S. 4898, now pending before the United States Senate. The latter measures, if enacted, will prevent the future occurrence of such conditions as now confront us, and the necessity for the temporary remedial legislation now under consideration emphasizes the importance of the early enactment of the general leasing measure.

Very truly, yours, FRANKLIN K. LANE.

A careful reading of Secretary Lane's report discloses that some temporary relief for these oil men engaged in oil production on the public domain is an emergency. The legislation authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to make working agreements whereby the oil claimants may go on with the production of oil, and thereby preserve the rights of themselves and the United States until a suitable leasing law can be passed covering the case.

Certain irregularities with reference to some of the oil operators have brought about a confusion of title. The institution of suits has caused the pipe lines to refuse to accept the oil and buy the oil, there being no market for the oil other than the pipe-line companies, and has brought stagnation in oil development.

As will be observed by the Secretary's letter and from facts brought to the attention of the committee in a printed hearing had, show that lands held in private ownership, most of which came from original land grants, of alternate sections make it possible for the lands held in private ownership to go on with the production, pumping, and draining of the Government lands to an extent that is greatly to the disadvantage of the General Government as well as to the oil prospectors themselves.

Twenty-five or thirty independent oil producers of California appeared before the committee and presented hardships, disaster, and trouble which deserves the attention of Congress, and at the earliest possible moment.

Your committee was unanimously of the opinion that, pending a time when these titles could be definitely settled and pending a time when those who deserve patents could get patents and those who should be denied patent could be formally denied patent, such temporary working arrangements as proposed in H. R. 15469 was about the only method of solving the problem.

The Secretary of the Interior is a man of broad views, keen intellect, and with peculiar and actual knowledge of the actual conditions as they exist, and it is the thought of every member of the committee, after prolonged hearings and painstaking attention, that this bill should be passed at once for the purpose of preserving what the Government has and what the developers of oil deserve, and to prevent damage and disaster from any source.

The actual method of working is thought to be that the Secretary will retain a sufficient portion of the proceeds of the oil to indemnify the Government in the event the title will finally be held to be adverse to the claimants, so that untold hardships may not follow. Some of the men developing oil in the California region have almost been driven to bankruptcy. Telegraphic appeals and personal appeals have come from California sources urging some action on the part of Congress.

The bill, as will be observed, does not part with title to a foot of land or to any oil or gas of the United States, but merely authorizes a continuation of operations to prevent waste, decay, destruction by water breaking in, and other disaster coming from the nonuse of oil machinery and oil development. The committee can not urge too strongly the advisability of this temporary relief, and that at the earliest possible moment.

The complaints have come chiefly from California and from a strip of country about 125 miles long and from 2 to 5 miles wide on the west side of the San Joaquin Valley in California.

As was suggested by Secretary Lane in his letter, there is pending in both branches of Congress, and in truth the bill before the House committee is well under way, legislation providing for a leasing system of the oil and gas lands of the United States, so that hereafter tangled titles relative to the procedure and acquirement may not be one of the troublesome tasks for the American Congress to deal with. The affording of this temporary relief by the passage of H. R. 15469 will in no manner interfere with the broad-gauged conservation policy outlined in the leasing law soon to be reported and now pending before both the House and Senate committees.

Respectfully submitted.

Mr. MANN. If the Government finds a case where gross injustice is being done to these people, there is no reason why the Interior Department should not decide the question of the patent. We passed a law three years ago in order that they might settle up these things, and this is to amend that act.

Mr. FERRIS. The commissioner informed us that they were working as fast as they could, but that notwithstanding that great injustice would be done.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection?

EXCHANGE OF LANDS IN WYOMING.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 65) to amend an act entitled "An act providing that the State of Wyoming be permitted to relinquish to the United States certain lands heretofore selected and to select other lands from the public domain in lieu thereof," approved April 12, 1910.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the act entitled "An act providing that the State of Wyoming be permitted to relinquish to the United States certain lands heretofore selected and to select other lands from the public domain in lieu thereof," approved April 12, 1910, be, and the same are hereby, extended so as to include and apply to the southeast quarter of section 13 in township 27 north, range 85 west.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. BROWN of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BROWN of New York, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER NEAR KANSAS CITY.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 14189) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River near Kansas City.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Missouri Valley Bridge & Iron Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Kansas, its successors and assigns, be, and are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a highway, trolley, and railroad bridge, and approaches thereto, across the Missouri River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation between the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway bridge and the mouth of the Big Blue River, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendment:

Lines 6 and 7, page 1, strike out the words "highway, trolley, and railroad."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I also reserve the right to object.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], the chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, desires to make a statement, I will give way to him for that purpose.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I prefer that the gentleman from Missouri make the statement. He has objected to an amendment which the committee made in accordance with its uniform conduct in striking out the words defining the character of the bridge. If the gentleman can state to the House any sufficient reason why we ought to vary the custom and put in that description of the character of the bridge, I am perfectly willing to bow to the opinion of the House, and the committee would agree with me in that concurrence. If the gentleman can satisfy the House that an exception ought to be made in this case, very well.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was introduced it attracted the attention of my constituents, who are directly interested in the bill. I may say that if this bridge is constructed across the Missouri River it will be from Jackson County on the south side to Clay County on the north. Jackson County is in the district represented by my colleague [Mr. BORLAND] and Clay County, on the north, is in the district represented by myself. My people, including the Commercial Club of Liberty, Mo., one of the largest towns in Clay County, Excelsior Springs being the other large town, are quite willing that a bridge may be constructed across the river at the point designated if it provides for a wagon and trolley and railroad bridge, but they are unwilling that such a bridge may be constructed unless it is provided for these three purposes. We have three bridges across the Missouri River now from Jackson to Clay County. Two of them are railroad bridges. The third is a combination railroad, trolley, and wagon bridge, but the wagon bridge or combination bridge is between the Burlington bridge on the west and the Milwaukee bridge on the east. This bill provides for the construction of a bridge east of the Milwaukee bridge and west of the mouth of the Blue River. On both sides of the river there is very rich land, suitable for market gardening. It is the wish of the farmers that if a bridge is constructed it may give them an outlet to the Kansas City markets.

There is no imperative demand for the construction of a railroad bridge alone, but it would serve a useful purpose if it also provides for a wagon bridge. And again, trolley lines are being extended from Kansas City north and suburban property developed. Already one has been constructed and goes over the combination bridge between the Burlington and the Milwaukee Bridges out through Liberty to Excelsior Springs, Mo., and we want to provide other outlets to the north. Of course a company may be organized under the law of the State of Missouri for the construction of a bridge, but if this bill had not provided for a highway, trolley, and railroad bridge, I should have gone before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and resisted, as much as I could, the favorable report on the bill. My colleague [Mr. BORLAND] and I are in perfect accord upon this matter. We both want this amendment, and our constituents want it. I do not know why it should not be incorporated in the bill.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. On several occasions I have raised a question with regard to the franchise granted to an individual or a concern that is to build a bridge. In this case the Missouri Valley Bridge & Iron Co., "a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Kansas," is to be given the right. Has the gentleman any assurance that the Missouri Valley Bridge & Iron Co. is a responsible concern, that it will build such a bridge as the people out there ought to have, or that it will build "a highway, trolley, or railroad bridge" if that specific provision is not incorporated in the law?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have not such assurance, hence I want the provision in express terms in the bill. I want to say this, however, that I understand the company is a responsible company.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say that the company is one of the most responsible companies in the bridge business, having constructed bridges at St. Louis and at other points along the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers.

Mr. MOORE. That answers the question to a certain extent; but it has been the policy of the committee, I have observed, not to concern itself particularly with regard to the company or the individual to whom the franchise is to be granted, that being left altogether to the Secretary of War to determine when the plans and specifications are laid before him. I assume the two gentlemen from Missouri are anxious to have it written into the law definitely as to what they are going to get in the way of a bridge, and that they would like a specific legal instruction in this respect to the Secretary of War.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes. Otherwise we do not want the bridge at all.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], amiable and able, contrary to his usual accuracy, has inadvertently made a statement which hardly does justice to the committee. He said that the committee does not usually inquire into the person and character of the applicant who desires the franchise to construct the bridge. The gentleman is laboring under a mistake there. The committee primarily passes on the question, first, whether or not the party named is a proper person, natural or artificial, or properly authorized for Congress to grant its consent for the building of a bridge. What is left for the War Department is to carry out the details and plans, and see that the bridge is constructed so as not to interfere with navigation. Now, I do not doubt it is desirable to the community to have a combination bridge, and it is desirable in the interest of navigation that if bridges are needed for vehicles and pedestrians as well as for railroads there should be as few bridges as possible, because every bridge is an obstruction to navigation; and while Congress may impose any reasonable condition it chooses as a condition of consenting at all for a party to build a bridge, the question is, Ought not the State which charters and authorizes the company to decide what sort of a bridge it is and what the local people need there? If the gentleman will state there is no way to secure any such authority in the State in which the bridge is to be built, they have obviated that question; and if they can not get it there, if the conditions are such we ought to put such conditions on our consent, then we are perfectly willing for the committee amendment to be disagreed to by the House.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman knows, of course, how highly I respect him, both personally and officially——

Mr. ADAMSON. It is a matter of pride to me.

Mr. MOORE. I think the gentleman will not deny that on frequent occasions we have been called upon to pass these bills by unanimous consent, where the person to whom the franchise was granted was, in effect, "John Doe," and the gentleman has taken the position——

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not remember any such bill.

Mr. MOORE. And the gentleman has taken the position on a number of these occasions that the responsibility was on the War Department in the first instance, and on the States in the second instance.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman fails to differentiate between the considerations expressed in a matter of this sort. We have consistently many times refused to consent to a proposition where we thought they did not mean business and were not able to carry out the project, and will always do it.

Mr. MOORE. If the gentleman will pardon me, I have a very distinct recollection of having raised this question at least twice before, where the committee itself had not taken any great pains to inquire as to responsibility of the individual seeking the privilege.

Mr. ADAMSON. That may have been the assumption of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but if the gentleman ever made any such point and it ever was conceded by the committee, I confess my recollection is very much at fault or I was so obtuse I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman is accustomed to fall back upon the general bridge act and the discretion lodged in the Secretary of War in these matters, and I thought it pardonable to call his attention to this question. Hence I have asked as to the responsibility of this bridge company.

Mr. ADAMSON. That only relates to the carrying out of the enterprise, seeing that the structure is so constructed that it will not interfere with navigation.

Mr. MOORE. That is a point in which I am very much interested, and it is covered by the report of the Secretary of War. It is very important to know, in the interest of navigation, whether the constructor of the bridge is responsible; whether he is going to put up a kind of bridge which ultimately will impede navigation; whether, in the event of the failure of the concern holding the franchise to build the bridge, there will be a failure to remove the obstruction, which may thus become a menace to navigation. It is entirely possible, although in this instance we are told that this Missouri company is responsible, that a franchise might be given to an irresponsible individual or concern, resulting in the construction of a bridge that would become an impediment to navigation.

Mr. ADAMSON. The propositions are referable to different authorities. The committee passes first on the probability of the projector carrying out the project. If there is no probability of his doing so, it will be idle to grant consent where there is any doubt about it. The other proposition rests with the Secretary of War, who, in the interest of navigation, has to see that the bridge is so built that the interests of navigation are protected.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that I investigated also personally the responsibility of these people who are asking to build this bridge, and I found their responsibility was ample for the work which they propose to undertake. Those were conditions precedent to my introducing the bill or presenting it to the committee. Now, I want to say this: I introduced this bill originally as a railroad bridge, because that was the kind of a bridge the projectors asked for. After I had done so the local conditions on both sides of the river, to which Judge ALEXANDER has referred, showed that it required the services of a highway bridge and a trolley bridge. There is no bridge nearer, at least, than 3 miles from this bridge, which ought to be a highway bridge——

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. In a moment. This is in a section of the country which is rapidly building up as a manufacturing suburb of Kansas City, a truck-gardening suburb, and a local residence section to Kansas City, and trolley lines, as Judge ALEXANDER has said, are extending across the river to the north and to Clay County and the rich bottom lands, and they are erecting residences, and it is becoming a very valuable suburban manufacturing district.

Now, this bridge will connect that kind of a district with the main center of Kansas City, and so I suggested to these objectors that they demand a highway bridge and trolley bridge. The local demand was very great. With some reluctance they consented to it and in that way got, of course, the united public sentiment of that community back of it.

As to the demand for the bridge, there is no question. Judge ALEXANDER and I have looked into that thoroughly, and we are convinced of it. Now, it is possible under our State law, I will say to the chairman of the committee, for a corporation to get a permit itself under the general provisions of the statute giving itself such powers as the corporation may ask. The corporation charters itself simply as a bridge for railroad purposes. The State does not give it a special charter or put any special conditions on it to meet a local demand for a highway.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is what I want the gentleman to make the House understand.

Mr. BORLAND. Here is a place where we have determined this requirement properly goes in. I understand the policy of the committee, or the main intention of Congress, is to give the authority of Congress to the bridging of a navigable stream, and that the other provisions are purely local; but the local demand is here that this description or character of bridge be put into the bridge act, and all parties have agreed upon that basis, and for that reason we are going to ask the committee to vote down the committee amendment striking out the words "highway, trolley, and railroad."

Mr. MOORE. I want to ask the gentleman whether he will not throw over to the discretion of the Secretary of War, if this bill passes without amendment, the character of the bridge that shall be constructed?

Mr. BORLAND. No, indeed. We have no desire to leave it to his discretion.

Mr. MOORE. The plans will have to be submitted to him by the bridge company, and then it will have to be determined by him, and be within his discretion, as to whether you will have a highway, trolley, or railroad bridge.

Mr. ADAMSON. If you agree to the amendment, that discretion remains in the bill.

Mr. MOORE. I say that if the committee amendment prevails, and the provision for the highway, trolley, and railway bridge is stricken out, which I understand the gentlemen from Missouri object to, then it will be left wholly to the discretion of the Secretary of War.

Mr. BORLAND. We are asking to have those words reinserted in the bill because of the local conditions there.

Mr. MOORE. That is what your people want. That is what people on either side of the river want, is it not?

Mr. BORLAND. That is what they want.

Mr. MOORE. And that is what you want to specify in the bill. That is the point I am making. If you do not include the amendment, then your people may not get what is contemplated by this franchise.

Mr. BORLAND. We want it in the bill. That is the proposition.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentlemen have concluded, I wish to say that this corporation is a local affair. It is not a regular railroad across the country, but a local affair which proposes to capitalize itself and construct a bridge for local convenience, and the gentleman from Missouri has satisfied me that there is difficulty in securing by local authority the requirement that this local company shall accommodate the entire public; and under the circumstances the committee will not feel aggrieved if the House disagrees to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish only to ask if the Missouri Valley Bridge & Iron Co., named in the bill, is a company which only constructs bridges?

Mr. BORLAND. They are a bridge-construction company, yes; but they construct bridges on their own account as well as under contract.

Mr. COOPER. Has the company heretofore constructed bridges and operated them?

Mr. BORLAND. I understand they have constructed them and afterwards leased them, or sold them, to other parties.

Mr. ANTHONY. I can say, for the information of the gentleman, that it is one of the most widely known bridge-construction companies in the country. They not only build bridges, but they build them and supply them to railroads. And as to this instance in Kansas City, even now they may have leases from three or four different kinds of railroads that contemplate using that bridge. Eventually the bridges they construct go over to some subsequent bridge company or to the railroads themselves.

Mr. COOPER. I take it, Mr. Speaker, that it is simply an ordinary construction company that has been consulted by some corporation, railroad or otherwise, desiring to have a bridge constructed, and that the name of this construction company was put into the bill instead of that of the railroad company.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the gentleman will pardon me——

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have a letter dated May 14, 1914, from J. D. Wilson, of the firm of J. D. Wilson, investments, 617 Dwight Building, Kansas City, Mo., in reference to this bill, in which he says:

KANSAS CITY, MO., May 14, 1914.

Hon. J. W. ALEXANDER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Bill H. R 14189, authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at Kansas City, introduced by Congressman BORLAND March 4.

I understand that the bill will be reached on the House Calendar Monday, May 18, and am writing to urge you to use every possible effort to have the House act on this day. I realize that the delay on this measure has been unavoidable, but further delay at this time will be very serious. Will you kindly give the bill your especial attention? Can not it be called out or even made a point of special order?

The Missouri Valley Bridge & Iron Co. have proceeded with their arrangements, depending on the permit to have been out before this time. The business men of Liberty and Excelsior Springs, property owners along the proposed rock road—in fact, practically all the southern part of Clay County—are interested in getting the matter under headway.

I trust that you will be able to have the bill acted on next Monday, and assure you that your efforts along that line will be greatly appreciated by all interested.

Yours, very truly, J. D. WILSON.

Liberty and Excelsior Springs are in my district. I do not know whether they are building the bridge as a local enterprise or with a view of leasing it to a railway company or not, but my people are interested in having it as a trolley as well as a steam railroad bridge.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I had in mind the importance of insisting, where it is possible to insist, that the phraseology of an original bill shall present what the people responsible for it really want, and thus notify people who are interested and entitled to notice of what it is proposed to have done. Now, this original bill notified the people who live in that vicinity, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] has said, that it was proposed to build a "highway, trolley, and railroad bridge." The people of that vicinity might very well be content to have such a bridge constructed. But the proposed amendment strikes out the words "highway, trolley, and railroad," and, if adopted, the bill would permit this company to construct any kind of a bridge and sell it to any person or corporation, while interested parties would not have notice of this change nor be afforded opportunity to present their possible objections to the enactment of the bill into law. I can not think of an easier way to mislead people interested in the construction of a bridge than by presenting the bill in the form in which it was originally presented to give to a company, its successors or assigns, the right to build a "highway, trolley, and railroad bridge," and then to strike out "highway, trolley, and railroad" and thus give the company the right to build any kind of a bridge it pleases to build, and to sell it to anybody to whom it pleases to sell.

Mr. BORLAND. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER. It is quite a different thing, and things of this kind ought to receive most careful consideration; and unless we can have consent now that that amendment shall be voted out, I shall object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not know how the gentleman is going to get consent to vote out the amendment before consent is given to consider the bill. I have stated that, inasmuch as the local authority did not require that the entire public should be accommodated, we are perfectly willing in this case, for the reason stated, that the House shall vote down the committee amendment. I think myself it ought to be voted down, after hearing the statements of these gentlemen.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the House Calendar. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, lines 6 and 7, strike out the words "highway, trolley, and railroad."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

FEDERAL BUILDING AT OSAGE CITY, KANS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 15080) to increase the limit of cost of Federal building at Osage City, Kans.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to erect and complete the post-office building at Osage City, State of Kansas, provided for in existing legislation, the limit of cost heretofore fixed by Congress be, and the same is hereby, increased in and by the sum of $7,000 over and above the $50,000 heretofore authorized, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to enter into contract for the erection and completion of said building within the limit of cost herein established.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask what is the necessity for this increase of the limit of cost?

Mr. CANTRILL. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that the report is very brief and sets out the necessity for it, and shows that they have submitted bids and can not get the bids within $7,000, which is the amount this bill asks for. The bill is in strict accordance with quite a number of other bills that we have passed at this session.

Mr. MADDEN. Why can they not get bids within the limit of cost?

Mr. CANTRILL. The Secretary of the Treasury says he has advertised for bids and the bids received are all too high.

Mr. MADDEN. That is probably because the plans are more elaborate than was intended.

Mr. CANTRILL. The bids were advertised in accordance with the plans of the Treasury Department.

Mr. MADDEN. But they ought to modify the plans.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The building as now planned provides for as cheap construction as is possible and advisable to construct any building, and the amount asked for here is simply sufficient to meet the necessities and make it possible to let the contract to the lowest bidder.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the total amount of the appropriation?

Mr. CANTRILL. Fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. MADDEN. That is, for the building?

Mr. CANTRILL. That is for the building and the site, and $9,000 was expended for the site.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the population of Osage City, Kans.?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Four thousand one hundred.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, on a building costing $50,000 the interest would be $2,500 a year, and you could rent a suitable place at $1,000 in any community like that that would be much better for the community than the building proposed to be erected.

Mr. CANTRILL. The gentleman will recall that we have reported dozens of bills of this character which have been passed, and that $50,000 is the least amount that is ever authorized for any public building.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say in connection with this that it is an extravagant waste of public money to put up a $50,000 building in a town of only 4,100 people. The cost of maintaining the building, for janitor service alone, will be more than the rental of a suitable building in which to conduct the Postal Service would amount to in that town if there were no public building there at all, and if I had my way there would not be any public buildings erected in communities of less than 25,000 people. But, of course, I have not my way about it; but I think this is not justifiable, and ought not to be allowed. But I am not going to object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANN. Wait a moment. I understood, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman wanted to bring up the Senate bill instead of the House bill?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Now is the time to do that.

Mr. CANTRILL. If the other request is granted, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that be done.

Mr. MANN. This comes ahead of the other.

Mr. CANTRILL. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the Senate bill 5066, which has passed the Senate and is identical with the House bill just reported, be considered instead of the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL] asks unanimous consent that the Senate bill 5066 be considered in lieu of the House bill.

Mr. MANN. It is not identical, but it is similar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL] asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 5066) to increase the authorization for a public building at Osage City, Kans.

Be it enacted, etc., That to enable the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to give effect to and execute the provisions of existing legislation authorizing the acquisition of land for the site and the erection of a public building at Osage City, Kans., the limit of cost heretofore fixed by Congress therefor be, and the same is hereby, increased $7,000, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to enter into contracts for the completion of said building within its limit of cost, including site.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CANTRILL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The House bill is laid on the table, without objection.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

NATIONAL ACADEMY OF SCIENCES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 4096) to amend the act authorizing the National Academy of Sciences to receive and hold trust funds for the promotion of science, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act to authorize the National Academy of Sciences to receive and hold trust funds for the promotion of science, and for other purposes, approved June 20, 1884, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That the National Academy of Sciences, incorporated by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1863, be, and the same is hereby, authorized and empowered to receive, by devise, bequest, donation, or otherwise, either real or personal property, and to hold the same absolutely or in trust, and to invest, reinvest, and manage the same in accordance with the provisions of its constitution, and to apply said property and the income arising therefrom to the objects of its creation and according to the instructions of the donors; Provided, however, That the Congress may at any time limit the amount of real estate which may be acquired and the length of time the same may be held by said National Academy of Sciences."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. DANFORTH], in charge of this bill, if he thinks there would be any objection to adding a section providing that the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved?

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. Speaker, I had not thought of any such amendment to the bill.

Mr. MANN. We usually add that section to all bills of this character.

Mr. DANFORTH. I should think it might be a serious thing, because it might affect the present power that the society possesses to receive gifts other than real estate, if you put that in.

Mr. MANN. We ought to have the power to affect it if we wish to hereafter.

Mr. DANFORTH. I will ask the gentleman if we have not the power now, without any such phrase?

Mr. MANN. There might be a controversy about that.

Mr. DANFORTH. This bill has been passed by the Senate——

Mr. MANN. That is nothing in its favor.

Mr. DANFORTH. And it has been considered and passed upon by the Judiciary Committee of the House and unanimously approved.

Mr. MANN. We are in the habit of reserving—and, I think, very properly—in every grant that we make of a special privilege, the right to alter, amend, or repeal the act.

Mr. DANFORTH. And the gentleman proposes to reserve the right to amend or repeal this act?

Mr. MANN. Yes; that is all that this would apply to. I offer an amendment as section 2 that the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws his pro forma amendment and offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, after line 8, insert a new section, as follows:
"SEC. 2 That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. DANFORTH, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

RECLAMATION OF HUAI RIVER, CHINA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 244) to authorize the President to grant leave of absence to an officer of the Corps of Engineers for the purpose of accepting an appointment under the Government of China on works of conservation and public improvement.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas the Republic of China, with the advice and assistance of the American Red Cross, has arranged for extensive reclamation work in China for the prevention of floods and the resultant famines and is desirous that an Engineer officer of the United States Army experienced in this class of work be permitted to serve in preparing the project and in the execution of the work; and

Whereas the United States of America wishes to show its friendly feeling for the Republic of China by complying with this desire: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to grant leave of absence to an officer of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, to assist the Republic of China, as a member of a board of officers to be designated by the Republic of China, to make an examination and report on the reclamation of Huai River, and thereafter to act as chief engineer of the Huai conservation work in China, to be appointed by the same authority (in pursuance of an arrangement between the American Red Cross and the Government of China); and that such officer while absent on such leave be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept from the Government of China the said employment with compensation from said Government: Provided, however, That the permission so given shall be held to terminate at such date as the President may determine; to insure the continuance and completion of this work the President may have the power of substitution in case of the termination of the detail of said officer for any cause; and that the officer, while so absent in the service of the Republic of China, shall receive no pay or allowance from the United States Government.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all of the preamble.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object. I am not in any way opposed to the purpose intended to be accomplished by this bill; but we all recognize that it is very probable that our Corps of Engineers may all be needed in case conditions in our neighboring Republic to the south do not develop satisfactorily. I notice on the calendar a bill of similar import, providing for permission to a retired officer of the Corps of Engineers to render service in connection with the New Jersey-New York Joint Harbor Line Commission, and special emphasis is laid upon the fact that it would not be advisable to delegate an active officer of the Engineer Corps for that purpose. Now, I should like to inquire of the gentleman having the bill in charge whether one of the retired officers of the Engineer Corps could not perform this humanitarian work in China as well as one now on the active list?

Mr. MANN. They would not want to send an old man over there.

Mr. KAHN. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that under the terms of this joint resolution the President is authorized to recall the officer at any time. He will find on page 2——

Mr. STAFFORD. I have read the resolution and report and am familiar with the provisions of the resolution.

Mr. KAHN. I will say to the gentleman, further, that this question has been taken up with the Chinese Government through the American Red Cross, and I believe that the officer who is to take charge of this work has been practically agreed upon.

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe this gentleman who has been decided upon for the work in China is also very desirous, in case of difficulties arising in Mexico, to serve his Government there. Does the gentleman think that if the Government designates this Army engineer to go to China he would be recalled and have his place in China left vacant after he has once been designated?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman speaks of "difficulties arising in Mexico." What difficulties does the gentleman refer to? The gentleman knows there will be no difficulty if we start in.

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not think the gentleman took such a roseate view of the situation down there.

Mr. MANN. I do not take a roseate view; but if we start in there will be no difficulty in our accomplishing the work we set out to do.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then there is the river and harbor work in this country.

Mr. MANN. They will attend to the river and harbor work without any difficulty.

Mr. KAHN. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that this officer is to cooperate with the officers appointed by the Chinese Government, and the officer who is to be sent over there has had a great deal of experience in connection with conservation and river work.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Who is that officer?

Mr. KAHN. I do not know.

Mr. MANN. May I ask if he is one of the gentlemen who has been "preventing" the floods on the Ohio and lower Mississippi Rivers in the United States?

Mr. KAHN. I understand this gentleman is familiar with this kind of work and has had considerable experience in it.

Mr. MANN. Does not my friend think if we should send one of these engineers over there it might be very valuable, in that if he could learn how to prevent floods on the Chinese rivers he might be able to come back with some knowledge of how to prevent floods on American rivers, which so far we have not been able to discover?

Mr. KAHN. He would at least learn how to minimize the damage.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think he is going over there to be educated. I think he is going over there to educate somebody else.

Mr. MANN. Any man who does work is educated by it.

Mr. STAFFORD. If he has not had experience already he will not be of much value to China.

Mr. KAHN. The Huai River in China overflows its banks about three years in five. These floods have resulted in great loss of life and frequent periods of famine; people have starved to death by the thousands. The American Red Cross has repeatedly sent contributions, and the charitable people of the world have repeatedly sent contributions of money and food into this district in order to alleviate the suffering of the people there.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. I prefaced my remarks with the statement that I was in sympathy with the measure, but I rose to inquire as to one fact which the gentleman seems to have overlooked. What I am seeking to find out is whether a retired Army officer would not perform this work as well as one in the active service.

Mr. KAHN. I do not think the retired officer could——

Mr. HAY. It is not within the power of the President to require a retired Army officer to perform the duty unless he chooses so to do.

Mr. KAHN. The retired officer must volunteer to go.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, there is on the calendar Senate joint resolution 29, authorizing the President to appoint a retired officer of the Corps of Engineers to assist in some harbor propositions about New York City. The correspondence with the War Department says that the retired officer is qualified to cooperate with that commission. Why can not there be a retired officer appointed for this position, if he is willing to do this work?

Mr. HAY. The President would have to get the consent of the retired officer, and he might not get the kind of man that he wanted who would agree to it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I can see that there might be some difficulty about that. My purpose was to gain the information as to the retired officer doing the work, and having obtained that, I withdraw the reservation of an objection.

Mr. RAKER. I understand the officer has been practically selected who is to perform this work, and that he has had experience, and understands the condition of the river—the low tide and the high tide, and so forth.

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no; the river is in the interior.

Mr. RAKER. I meant the high and low water.

Mr. KAHN. This river flows through a valley, one of the great alluvial plains of China.

Mr. RAKER. Would the officer receive compensation from the Government during this time?

Mr. KAHN. No. Under the terms of the resolution, he is not even to receive any allowances.

Mr. RAKER. I understand the Red Cross of the United States, through its president and officers, particularly Miss Boardman, is very anxious to have this resolution passed?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. In that case, I am in favor of it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, there is a Senate bill in identical terms on the Speaker's table, and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in lieu of the House bill. I do not know but that it has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MANN. If it is referred, it is not on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that Senate joint resolution 139 be substituted for this resolution.

Mr. RAKER. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if the bills are in the same language?

Mr. KAHN. They are identically the same.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate joint resolution 139.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. J. Res. 139. To authorize the President to grant leave of absence to an officer of the Corps of Engineers for the purpose of accepting an appointment under the Government of China on works of conservation and public improvement.

Whereas the Republic of China, with the advice and assistance of the American Red Cross, has arranged for extensive reclamation work in China for the prevention of floods and the resultant famines and is desirous that an Engineer officer of the United States Army, experienced in this class of work be permitted to serve in preparing the project and in the execution of the work; and

Whereas the United States of America wishes to show its friendly feeling for the Republic of China by complying with this desire: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to grant leave of absence to an officer of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, to assist the Republic of China, as a member of a board of officers to be designated by the Republic of China, to make an examination and report on the reclamation of Huai River, and thereafter to act as chief engineer of the Huai conservation work in China, to be appointed by the same authority (in pursuance of an arrangement between the American Red Cross and the Government of China); and that such officer while absent on such leave be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept from the Government of China the said employment with compensation from said Government: Provided, however, That the permission so given shall be held to terminate at such date as the President may determine. To insure the continuance and completion of this work the President may have the power of substitution in case of the termination of the detail of said officer for any cause; and that the officer, while so absent in the service of the Republic of China, shall receive no pay or allowances from the United States Government.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, the Senate bill is on the Unanimous Consent Calendar?

The SPEAKER. The Senate bill is on the Speaker's table.

Mr. BARTLETT. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. The Senate bill being on the Speaker's table and a bill of identical character being on the calendar, is it not a matter of privilege and not a matter for unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It is a matter of privilege if the gentleman had called it up that way, but he is not calling it up that way.

Mr. MANN. It is not a matter of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The Senate bill has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. It was the Chair's mistake. The bill has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Military Affairs and consider the Senate joint resolution in place of the House joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from California if the Government of China asks for the assignment of this officer?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; the Government of China proposes to issue bonds to the extent of $20,000,000 for the purpose of performing this work.

Mr. MACDONALD. I understand that there is a proposition to sell those bonds in this country?

Mr. KAHN. Not that I know of. I have not heard of that. The Government of China proposes to do this work.

Mr. MACDONALD. I understand that the White Engineering Corporation, of New York, is interested in the work?

Mr. KAHN. They have been recommended by the Government as having performed work at Panama and in the United States for the Government of the United States to the satisfaction of the Government of the United States. The Government of China asked whether a concern could be recommended that would do the work at a reasonable cost and satisfactorily. I understand that this Government recommended that company and expressly stated that the Government itself could take no hand in it, but could only recommend.

Mr. MACDONALD. I would like to ask if there have not been some steps taken toward assuring the parties interested that it would be possible to raise the money on these bonds in this country?

Mr. KAHN. I have no knowledge on that score.

Mr. MACDONALD. I have no objection to the project. It seems to be a meritorious one, but the method looks like dollar diplomacy.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to impede the passage of the gentleman's bill, but if it is to be taken as a precedent, it seems to me the request ought to be to consider the Senate joint resolution in lieu of the House joint resolution.

Mr. KAHN. That is exactly what I asked to do.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understood the Speaker to say "substitute."

The SPEAKER. The request is to consider it in lieu of the House joint resolution. The Chair was wrong in the statement of fact originally that the joint resolution was on the Speaker's table. It had been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. Now the gentleman from California asks to discharge the Committee on Military Affairs from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution and consider it in lieu of the House joint resolution. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I did not object to the consideration of this bill, but I can not say that I am enthusiastically in favor of it. I doubt very much the propriety of the Red Cross Association going into the business of public improvemen in this or any other country. So long as the Red Cross confines itself to giving aid in time of distress it probably will enjoy the confidence of all nations and of all peoples of the world and obtain generous contributions, but when it starts in to be manipulated, as will eventually happen if it pursues this policy, by men who are seeking franchises or concessions from foreign Governments, it will have ended its usefulness. We have plenty of work for the American Red Cross, or anyone else who knows how to prevent floods on the rivers, in the United States without going to China.

My friend from California [Mr. KAHN] says that this Huai River is overflowed three years out of five. Well, the lower Mississippi River has overflowed oftener than that in the last five years, but whether that be the case or not, somebody, somewhere, is going to endeavor to make a lot of money out of this proposition. Whether the Government of China issuing $20,000,000 of bonds will expend that directly, or whether it will let a contract to people already known, I do not know. I was told by people who are favorable to this proposition that an arrangement had already been practically entered into by which work was to be done by contractors, or a contractor, in this great public undertaking and that it was desired to have the benefit of the experience of an engineer of the United States, and I do not doubt, although that was not added, the influence that would come from the United States Government through its President having designated an Army officer to look after the work. We may next have the Red Cross looking after the new river which has lately been discovered in South America, or the Amazon River. We may next have it endeavoring to prevent plague and famine by undertaking some kind of public work. That is not the province of the Red Cross. It has no right, in my judgment, to go into the business of public works, and if it does to any extent, it will have after it everyone who wants to get a railroad concession or a harbor concession or any other kind of a concession from a foreign government, because there is no project where it can not be claimed it is in the interest of health. I shall not oppose this resolution. I have the highest regard for the Red Cross and for its president, but I believe that it has made a mistake in reference to this matter, and I am very sure if it continues in this course it will soon end its usefulness.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] overlooked the fact that the charter of the American Red Cross authorizes that organization to look after the welfare of people not only in the United States but throughout the civilized world.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I did not overlook that fact, having helped to pass the Red Cross charter.

Mr. KAHN. That is one of the provisions of that charter.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will ask my friend a question, and that is whether he thinks the American Red Cross ought to get busy about the method of preventing the floods on the lower Mississippi River and tell this Government how to prevent it?

Mr. KAHN. If this Government were to ask the American Red Cross to take up that work, then I think the American Red Cross ought to get busy with it.

Mr. MANN. My information comes just the other way.

Mr. KAHN. The Government of China did ask the American Red Cross to help that Government do something to prevent those floods; the American Red Cross at that time suggested the services of Mr. Jameson, an engineer who had been in China for many years, and this engineer made quite an extensive survey which, I understand, materially aided the people of China in the preliminary work.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Is the request of the Government of China a matter of official record?

Mr. KAHN. I believe it is.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. It does not so appear in the report.

Mr. KAHN. I think in the letter of the Secretary of War favoring the proposition he said that it is desired by the Government of China. I had the report before me a moment ago. If the gentleman desires, I will read the letter of the Secretary.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I would like to hear it.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, this letter is addressed to Senator CHAMBERLAIN, and is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 4, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Referring to the proposed joint resolution authorizing the President, in his discretion, to grant leave of absence to an officer of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, to assist the Republic of China as a member of a board of officers to be designated by the Republic of China to make an examination and report on the reclamation of Huai River, and thereafter to act as chief engineer of the Huai conservation work in China, to be appointed by the same authority, I beg to say that this joint resolution has been carefully considered by the Judge Advocate General and it fully meets with my approval. I believe the granting of leave of absence to an officer of the Corps of Engineers for this purpose will not only do a great and valuable work for China, but will be a testimonial of our friendly feeling for that country and a desire to be of assistance to her in this great humanitarian work.

Sincerely, yours,

LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War.

While the language of the letter does not show that the request was made by the Government of China, I understand that is the fact.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. There is nothing in the report, then, to indicate that the Government of China actually had made such a request?

Mr. KAHN. There is not.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. There is an intimation to that effect, but nothing direct.

Mr. KAHN. I understand, however, that such a request has been made by the Government of China, and, furthermore, there is an officer of the Chinese Government now on his way to Washington to consult with the officials of our Government about the matter.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. How long is this officer to remain over there?

Mr. KAHN. I presume so long as it will be necessary for him to make the necessary plans.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is quite likely; but how long is it going to take to make the necessary plans?

Mr. KAHN. I do not know. The resolution itself provides that whenever the President of the United States desires or finds it necessary to recall the officer he may do so. This officer will be only one officer of several, the others to be appointed, of course, by the Republic of China.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The information is very clear, and I am very much obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that it will be about three years.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAY). The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KAHN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

HOMESTEAD ENTRY OF MINORS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2419) permitting minors of the age of 18 years or over to make homestead entry or other entry of the public lands of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, by authority of the Public Lands Committee I am authorized to report this bill and place it upon the Unanimous Consent Calendar, with the hope that its importance would be recognized by everyone and that no objection would be made to its consideration at this time.

While the bill as it comes before us is a Senate bill, it is identical with my bill (H. R. 10838), and reads as follows:

That any minor of the age of 18 years or over, and otherwise qualified under the public-land laws, shall be permitted to make homestead and desert-land entries under and subject to the public-land laws of the United States: Provided, That no minor shall be eligible to make final proof upon any such entry until he or she shall have attained the age of 21 years.

There are many reasons why the Public Lands Committee and the Members of the House from the Western States believe the enactment of this law would be in accordance with sound public policy and in the interest of the development of the West.

The demands for the enactment of this measure come primarily from the Northwest, because of the fact that the Canadian public-land laws are so much more liberal than ours that our boys in the Northwestern States are many of them attracted to Canada because their laws allow an 18-year-old boy to acquire a home, and they are taking up the public lands of that Dominion in preference to our own. This measure was referred to both the Interior Department and the Agriculture Department for a report, and both of those departments have strongly indorsed it.

The newspapers and the public generally throughout all of the Western States have very heartily indorsed this measure. I have received hundreds of communications favoring it since I introduced the bill. And at the third annual conference of the western governors, held in Denver last month, the governors of all of the Western States went on record and unanimously resolved that—

We approve the plan now before Congress to permit homestead entries by persons over 18 years of age.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will.

Mr. MOORE. How much land would be reserved for a boy of 18 years of age?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. One hundred and sixty acres.

Mr. MOORE. Did we not pass a law some time ago increasing the number to 320?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; but that only applies to such lands as may be designated by the Secretary of the Interior as being entirely arid, lands that can not be irrigated. That does not change the general homestead law as to other lands.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman know of any other instance in which the law recognizes a minor 18 years of age to be qualified to hold property?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, if a minor is married he can take a homestead now.

Mr. MOORE. I know, but——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will say this——

Mr. MOORE. He might hold title through a guardian or trustee?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The bill does not allow them to acquire title to the land until they are 21 years of age. It allows them to make a settlement upon the public domain.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman know of any other instance in which the law makes an exception of this kind?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. My idea in introducing this bill was to encourage our boys and girls in making a home, in getting a start in the world, and at the same time increasing the agricultural products of the country. The portion of our public domain now remaining open to settlement is very inferior to what it used to be. It is the land that has been passed over for 50 years and that no one would take.

Mr. MOORE. I know——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. And my idea is that Congress should encourage our boys and girls to go on a farm and stay there.

Mr. MOORE. As I read the reports coming from the Interior Department and some of the speeches which emanate from that department, there seems to be a great desire to give land away, to dispose of it to somebody; but after it is given away we sometimes hear a great deal about its being gobbled up and turned over in some form or other to monopolists, resulting in investigations by Congress, at great expense to the people.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. As a matter of fact, about 99 per cent of all this muckraking talk about fraud and monopoly of the public lands is pure buncombe; it is absolutely a bugaboo. There is no monopoly of agricultural land in the West to-day, and everyone who has a big farm is trying to cut it up and sell it off into smaller tracts. That is the tendency all over the West at the present time.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I can also say to the gentleman there is not much land to be given away.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No. The land that is left is not, generally speaking, very desirable. It is either very difficult and expensive to clear or it is arid land that can not be irrigated.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will also say for the benefit of the gentleman from Pennsylvania the enlarged homestead act does not apply to North and South Dakota, and the purpose of this measure is to enable those 18 years of age to enter 160 acres as a homestead. It will enable families to acquire land sufficient so they can live upon land that is located mostly in arid or semiarid portions of the country. The lands are really only suitable for grazing purposes in most instances. If 18-year-old boys can take a homestead, it will encourage them to remain at home instead of going into the crowded cities.

Mr. MOORE. I want to say to the gentleman from South Dakota and also to the gentleman from Colorado, in passing, that when we hear in the East of these 160-acre tracts being given away, and of these tracts of 320 acres in arid or semiarid regions which it is now proposed to increase to 640 acres, we sometimes wonder why so many people are pressing to get arid and semiarid land in such large quantities when we have good, workable land along the Atlantic seacoast waiting for people to come and till it. I read only the other day a speech by the Assistant Secretary of the Interior intimating it was impossible for a man to keep a family on 640 acres of land——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I want to remind the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the boys serving in the Navy and the Marine Corps are, many of them, not more than 18 years old, and their average age is about 20. I would like to ask him if he would say that those who recently gave their lives at Vera Cruz were too young to file a homestead? I would encourage our boys to remain at home and stay on the farms instead of enlisting in the Army and the Navy; and surely if a boy is old enough for military service he ought to be eligible to file on the public domain.

Mr. MOORE. That is a very fine and very patriotic utterance of the gentleman from South Dakota, and I quite agree that a majority of those serving at Vera Cruz are about 21 years of age and that many of those who laid down their lives for their country were but 20 years of age. We are very proud of them. But it is somewhat anomalous for us to be passing laws constantly that prevent boys and girls from going to work until they are 16 or 17 years old and then at 18 years of age saddle them with the responsibility of 160 acres on which to remain——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There is nothing compulsory about this bill. It merely furnishes an opportunity to boys and girls to get a start in the world—to have something to work for. It is a chance to work and at the same time make a home. There are many thousands of boys who have to support themselves from and after they are 18. The clearing of a farm and building a home is healthful work and much better for a boy in most cases than going to the city and hunting a job.

Mr. MOORE. You pass laws to prevent them from working, and then would pass laws to permit them to acquire property and force them to earn a living.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. In Texas we have reserved 640 acres of land, and we find that they are taking them up very rapidly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. While our Government has in former years been extremely generous in the disposition of the public lands, yet everyone from the West or Northwest knows that in recent years the regulations of the Department of the Interior in regard to the qualifications for entry, residence, and improvements on lands entered under the homestead and desert-land laws have often been harshly strict in their requirements. The interpretation of the law during recent years has also frequently been unreasonably burdensome; and the homestead settlers have not only been held to a literal compliance with the law, but to a strict and technical compliance with many regulations, some of which have been impractical and have often caused a forfeiture of their rights or worked a very great inequitable and unwarranted hardship upon the poor but bona fide settlers upon the public domain. The ever-present special field agents and inspectors have been on hand to protest any proof offered where it has been thought the settler has not fully and technically complied with all the requirements of the law and regulations with respect to residence, cultivation, and improvements.

Until the act of June 6, 1912, a residence of five years was required under the homestead law before the settler was permitted to make final proof and receive patent. Under the law as it always has been and now is one of the qualifications for entry is that the entryman shall be the head of a family or of the age of 21 years. The act of June 6, 1912, reduces the period of residence from five to three years "from the time of establishing actual, permanent residence upon the land." The requirements of this law and the department in regard to cultivation are much more strict and expensive than under the old five-year homestead law.

The richest and most fertile of the agricultural lands belonging to the public domain in all the Western and Northwestern States were taken many years ago, and now we only have left lands that have for the past 50 years been passed over as being too expensive to clear or not worth taking. Under the laws existing from 1876 until 1890 a qualified settler had, as it was termed, his "three rights." First, a preemption right provided for by section 2259 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, under which he could acquire title to 160 acres of land by six months' residence and cultivation and on payment of $1.25 per acre; second, a timber-culture entry right, under which he could acquire title to 160 acres of land without residence thereon and by cultivating 10 acres thereof to trees, and at the end of 8 years, and not exceeding 10 years, paying the land-office fees, amounting to the sum of $14; and, third, his homestead right under section 2289, Revised Statutes, whereunder he could acquire a patent to a homestead of 160 acres after 5 years' residence and cultivation and upon the payment of the land-office fees of $14. He had, under the law, the privilege of making commutation proof on his homestead after 6 months' residence and cultivation, and in case of commutation he was required to pay in addition to such land-office fees the sum of $1.25 per acre, the same as in the case of a preemption. If the entryman had served as a soldier in the War of the Rebellion, his period of service was credited on the time he was required to reside on his homestead.

But with the passing into private ownership of the best public lands and the consequent upbuilding of all the great Western States by the owners of those lands the liberal land laws and liberal construction thereof of earlier days have also passed into history and the homesteader of to-day is confronted with an entirely different situation.

The timber-culture law has been repealed. The preemption law has been repealed, excepting as to a few very small tracts of Indian reservation land. There were only 22 preemption entries made in the United States during the past fiscal year.

The stone-and-timber law has been practically rendered inoperative by regulations. There were during the last fiscal year only 946 final entries made under that law in the United States.

The isolated-tract law, one of the most beneficial laws on the statute books, has likewise been practically nullified by regulations. The entries do not seem to be reported, but the total number during the last year was probably much less than 500.

The desert-land law was years ago attended with considerable irregularities and some fraud, but in recent years it has, owing to regulations, been attended with so much hardship that it is also becoming unimportant. Throughout the entire United States there were only 2,102 final desert-land entries made during the last fiscal year.

The enlarged-homestead act applies only to certain nonirrigable land in the semiarid portions of certain States, and the Kinkaid Act applies to only a portion of western Nebraska. There were only 737 final mineral entries and 76 coal-land entries in this entire country during the past fiscal year, ending June 30, 1913.

So that with the above comparatively negligible exceptions there is not, and has not been for several years past, any other method of acquiring title to any portions of our agricultural or nonmineral public domain except through homestead entry, with the very strict requirements of that law and the regulations thereunder. The records of our General Land Office show in a very striking way the marvelous benefits of a liberal homestead law. During the first year after the passage of the three-year homestead law the final homestead entries throughout the United States more than doubled. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, the total homestead entries throughout the United States were 24,326, covering 4,306,068 acres of land. The three-year homestead law was passed on June 6, 1912, and during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, there were in the United States 53,252 final homestead entries made, covering more than 10,000,000 acres of the public domain; and notwithstanding that this law requires much more cultivation and improvements than the old five-year homestead law.

While there will probably be some less homestead entries during the present fiscal year, the above figures conclusively show the benefits of that law and illustrate why it is that hundreds of thousands of our citizens go to Canada to obtain a home.

The most desirable portions of the agricultural lands having been selected and entered many years ago, and the lands opened for homestead settlement for the last several years being in that part of the country where there is liable to be in any year or through a series of years an insufficient rainfall for the successful raising of crops, it is hardly to be expected that such lands would be taken and occupied unless conditions in regard to qualifications for entry, residence, and cultivation were otherwise favorable.

The opening up for homestead settlement of the rich agricultural lands in the three great Canadian Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta, has been in itself an inducement for the emigration of citizens of many States, especially those along the Canadian border, into Canada in order that they might acquire title to land and make for themselves a home.

But the greatest inducement for such emigration is found in the more liberal land laws of the Dominion of Canada. Under our law the young man must be at least 21 years of age before he can make homestead entry, while under the Canadian law he is permitted to make such entry on arriving at the age of 18 years.

Realizing that the State of South Dakota, as well as other States, was being deprived of some of our most enterprising and ambitious young men by reason of the better opportunities afforded them in Canada, the South Dakota Legislature, on the 8th day of March, 1913, passed a house joint resolution memorializing Congress to amend the homestead law so as to permit male minors over 18 years of age to make entry. The recitals preliminary to the resolution are significant; they are:

> Inasmuch as many young men 18 years of age and under 21 years of age are self-supporting, and, further, inasmuch as the Canadian homestead laws permit male minors over 18 years of age to make homestead entry, etc.

The resolution then proceeds to memorialize Congress "to amend the homestead laws to permit male minors 18 years of age or over to make homestead entry under the same conditions as if they were over 21 years of age."

That memorial is certainly most timely, and it is deemed of the utmost importance that Congress should pass a law which will afford to those desiring to make homes on the public lands open for settlement opportunities as nearly equal as possible to those afforded by an adjacent foreign Government with a soil equally if not more fertile than the soil of any of the lands yet available within the borders of the United States.

A comparison of the land laws of the Dominion of Canada with those of the United States shows many other beneficial features and far greater liberality in the settlement and occupation of homestead lands than such as pertain merely to the age at which homestead entry may be made.

Thus, section 106 of the Dominion lands act of 1906 (vol. 2, Revised Statutes of Canada) permits any male person who has attained the age of 18 years to make purchase of any land which had theretofore been sold to a purchaser and who had failed to comply with the conditions of sale and whose purchase has therefore been canceled, such purchase to be for a price fixed by the minister, but at not less than $1 per acre. Residence and cultivation upon said land must be as provided in the homestead law. Section 109 of said statutes provides that every person who is the sole head of a family and every male who has attained the age of 18 years who makes application according to a certain prescribed form is entitled to obtain homestead entry for any quantity of land not exceeding one quarter section, the land to be of a class open to homestead entry under the provisions of the act. The privilege of homestead entry applies to agricultural lands only.

Final proof may be made at the expiration of three years from the date of entry. No patent, however, may issue to any person who is not a subject of Great Britain by birth or naturalization.

It will be seen from this that the homesteader who has emigrated to Canada from the United States must, in order to obtain a homestead, cease to be a citizen of the United States and become a citizen and subject of a foreign country.

The law in regard to the proof of residence and cultivation is evidently more liberal than our own homestead laws. Section 126 provides that—

> Proof of residence or cultivation required by the three last preceding sections of this act, and of the erection of a habitable house, shall be made by the claimant by affidavit, and shall be corroborated by the evidence on oath of two disinterested witnesses resident in the vicinity of the land to which the evidence relates, and shall be subject to acceptance as sufficient by the commissioner of Dominion lands or the Dominion lands board; and such affidavit shall be sworn and such evidence given before the local agent or his senior assistant, or before some other persons named for that place by the minister.

The Canadian law has the further liberal provision that—

> If the father (or the mother if the father is deceased) of any person who is eligible to make a homestead entry * * * resides upon a farm in the vicinity of the land entered for by such person, the requirements * * * as to residence prior to obtaining patent may be satisfied by such person residing with the father or mother. (Sec. 131, Dom. Lands, Rev. Stat., 1906.)

The Canadian laws also make provision for the settling of homesteaders together in a hamlet or village in numbers embracing at least 20 families, with a view to greater convenience in the establishment of schools and churches, and in such cases the minister is permitted to vary or dispense with the requirements of the law in regard to residence. (Sec. 121, Dom. Lands, Rev. Stat., 1906.)

And if any settler has his permanent residence upon farming land owned by him in the vicinity of his homestead, the requirements of the law in regard to residence may be satisfied by residence upon said land. (Sec. 132, Dom. Lands, Rev. Stat., 1906.)

The reason for the emigration of our young men and citizens to Canada is easily found in these liberal provisions of Canadian homestead law, and in the prospect of securing title to lands equal, if not superior, to any now remaining in our public domain and open to homestead settlement.

The records show that it is now, and has for several years, been a serious question with any prospective homesteader of full age as to which of the two offers he will accept, namely, that of the United States, permitting him to enter any quarter section yet open for settlement under our homestead laws and present regulations with the conditions they impose, or that of the Dominion of Canada, under the prospects and liberal conditions there existing.

It should not be a matter of wonder that hundreds of thousands of such prospective homeseekers have accepted the latter proposition, even though it involved a renunciation of their American citizenship.

But with the minor of 18 years of age desirous of acquiring land, which everybody knows he is capable of improving and cultivating, there is no choice. He must emigrate to Canada or remain without the land.

The figures showing the numbers who have emigrated to Canada during the last 10 years are somewhat startling.

On January 28 of the present year Mr. William J. White, being a witness before the lobby investigating committee of the Senate, in answer to questions propounded by Senator NELSON, said:

> Senator NELSON. What is the number of the immigrants that have come from the United States to your Provinces during the last 4 or 5 years or the last 10 years?
> Mr. WHITE. This last year, up till November, there were about 115,000. Last year, up to the present time, there were about 141,000. The year before that there were about 110,000, and the year before that the same. It has been running along about 100,000, last——
> Senator NELSON. Ten years, has it not?
> Mr. WHITE. It has been running about 100,000 for the last five years. Last year—that is, the fiscal year ending March, 1913—was our largest year. There were about 141,000.
> Senator NELSON. And for the last five or six years the general average has been 100,000?
> Mr. WHITE. Yes; about 100,000.
> Senator NELSON. And how many have you gotten in all from the United States in the last 10 years, we will say?
> Mr. WHITE. Our records will show that we have had about 800,000. Some of them have been going back and going into Montana and taking up homesteads in Montana, and we may not have as many as 800,000.

Mr. White is the agent and representative of the Canadian Dominion, and is, or was at the time of giving his testimony, in charge of the advertising, and had been in charge of such advertising for a number of years, and according to his statement, his Government spends between $60,000 and $70,000 a year in such advertising. (See pp. 4686–4690 of hearings.)

In view of all these conditions the committee believes the time is at hand when the Government, as a matter of wise public policy, should adopt a more liberal rule as to the disposition of its remaining agricultural lands.

While the South Dakota memorial related only to male persons of the age of 18 years, yet your committee, recognizing the fact that under the general homestead law of the United States females of the age of 21 years, and otherwise qualified as to citizenship, and so forth, may make entries of the public lands, deems it advisable to extend the provisions of the law in regard to age to them as well as male persons.

The bill with the amendments reported by the committee confining its operation to homestead and desert-land entries, is along the line of a more just and liberal policy of encouraging homebuilding by our boys and girls.

Those 800,000 American citizens who have expatriated themselves for a home were the farmers and young men, the bone and sinew, the best citizenship of this country, and their loss to our country is beyond the possibility of any estimation. They are the kind of people we most need at this time. With our agricultural productions decreasing at a terrific and alarming rate, as compared with our increase in population; with our high cost of living still getting higher; with our 665,891,029 acres of unappropriated and unreserved public domain, besides 165,000,000 acres of forest reserves, all of which is producing comparatively nothing and costing millions of dollars a year to supervise, it would seem as though it is time to change somewhat our public-land policy and allow at least the agricultural portions of this land to go into private ownership and be used for the homes of our citizens and the production of agricultural crops. It is not only a colossal financial blunder, but an outrage against the present generation, to hold all of that imperial domain in idleness for future generations when every township of cultivated land increases the wealth of the State a million dollars every year.

The most beneficial use is the only kind of conservation that should be practiced by our Government. It is not conservation of agricultural lands to make no use of them, except for grazing purposes, and keep them in the barren state in which they have existed for thousands of years. Let us cease driving good American citizens to Canada for land. Let us give our people a home on our public domain and welcome them to an abiding place under our own flag.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I regret that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has objected to the present consideration of the bill permitting minors of the age of 18 years or over to make homestead or other entry of the public lands. In my opinion, there can be no valid objection to this bill. It is advocated by Representatives from Western States and has been passed by the Senate. It would encourage further settlement of vacant Government land, and enlarge the productive forces of the Nation; it would give to many American youth the incentive to make and acquire homes. The city as well as the country boy would take advantage of this legislation. It would stimulate home building and develop worthy traits of character. The farmer's son is often obliged to leave the country to make his way in the city. He passes from the producing to the consuming class. He should be encouraged to remain in the country. The Government can well afford to be generous in its disposal of the public lands when our American boys are to be the beneficiaries. The title will not pass from the Government until the entryman shall have reached the age of 21. I would like to support a bill more liberal in its terms than the measure now before us. I would favor a provision allowing the entryman to reside with his relatives within 10 or 15 miles of the tract filed upon, provided the requirements for cultivation and improvements were observed. I realize that such a liberal measure would not be considered and was therefore in hopes that this bill would not meet with any objection and would become a law. In the face of the generally recognized fact that tenancy is increasing at a marked ratio throughout the country, and that the Government through various agencies is endeavoring to cultivate a policy of agricultural development, I can not understand why any Member of this House should oppose this legislation. The public land remaining for settlement is largely located in the arid region of the West. Its cultivation requires intelligent and patient effort. I contend that the young men who have been reared in that section, who understand the proper methods of cultivation and realize the difficulties to be overcome, are better fitted to occupy and develop this land than the residents of other sections or those who have recently come to us from across the sea. I am still hopeful that the Committee on Rules will see fit to bring this bill before the House under a special rule when the objection of a single Member will not prevent its consideration and passage.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I will not object.

Mr. MANN. Has my request been submitted?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has, and the request was granted.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SALES BY ARMY TO MILITARY SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9042) to permit sales by supply departments of the Army to certain military schools and colleges.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, educational institutions to which an officer of the Army is detailed as professor of military science and tactics may purchase from the War Department for cash, for the use of their military students, such stores, supplies, matériel of war, and military publications as are furnished to the Army, such sales to be at the price listed to the Army with the cost of transportation added: Provided, That all moneys received from the sale of stores, supplies, matériel of war, and military publications to educational institutions to which an officer of the Army is detailed as professor of military science and tactics shall respectively revert to that appropriation out of which they were originally expended and shall be applied to the purposes for which they are appropriated by law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to permit sales by the supply department of the Army to certain military schools and colleges. As said in the report:

This bill is designed to help perfect a detail in the operation of the long-approved plan of the United States to encourage, in various institutions of learning throughout the country, the practical instruction of young men in the military policy of the Nation, and in such forms of elementary military training as may help them the more readily to adapt themselves to actual service in the Volunteer Army in the emergency of war. This is a recognized part of the American policy of avoiding the burden of a large and expensive standing army, while at the same time instilling into the youth of the land a proper understanding of the true martial spirit and military efficiency that the country must rely upon from its great body of citizenship in such a crisis.

There are at present in the United States approximately 100 military colleges and schools under the supervision of the War Department giving such instruction to 28,000 of our young men. These young men in the course of time become the center of great influence as citizens, and, if necessary, citizen soldiers.

The bill has the commendation of the War Department.

Mr. Speaker, to my mind, the bill is a most meritorious one. Any measure that has for its object aid to education of the youth of our country meets my most hearty approval. We ought to train even more young men than we now train in these institutions; and, in my judgment, the National Government ought to organize more educational institutions in which the youth of our country may be given a military training and at the same time an excellent college training.

Be that as it may, the institutions that are already being aided by the Government ought to be further aided by being permitted to buy their supplies at the cheapest possible price, as provided for in this bill. The bill was introduced by the distinguished chairman of the Military Committee, Mr. HAY. Mr. GREENE of Vermont, who made the report, is temporarily out of the city, at West Point, on official duty there.

I hope the bill will pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MCKELLAR, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

INVESTIGATION OF VESSEL AND STEAMSHIP LINES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was House concurrent resolution No. 35, directing the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate and report facts regarding ownership, organization, operation, and rates of vessels and steamship lines engaged in transporting freight between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

The resolution was read, as follows:

House concurrent resolution 35.

Resolved, etc., That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to immediately investigate and, as soon as practicable, report to Congress the following information:

1. To what extent, if any, vessels and steamship lines are engaged in transporting freight between Atlantic and Pacific ports wholly by water, or partly by water and partly by rail, and in the coastwise trade of the United States, under joint ownership or common control or in community of interest, directly or indirectly, by stock ownership, trust, holding committee, or otherwise, with railroad companies engaged in transporting freight by rail between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States and in the coastwise trade of the United States, stating separately what vessels and steamship lines are owned and controlled by said railroad companies, if any, and what vessels and steamship lines in said transportation are under a common or joint ownership or control with said railroad companies, or any thereof, and the names of the owners, stockholders, trustees, holding committees, directors and officers of all steamship lines and railroads engaged in the coastwise and foreign trade of the United States. And to what extent and how, if any, they are consolidated, directed, or operated by and through holding companies, interlocking stock, interlocking directorates, or interlocking officers.

2. What are the prevailing rates upon the principal commodities carried by vessels between said Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States wholly by water or partly by water and partly by rail across the Isthmus of Panama or Tehuantepec, and what are the prevailing rates between said Atlantic and Pacific ports upon such commodities transported wholly by rail and what are the prevailing rates for transportation of similar commodities wholly by water by vessels not under United States registry for similar distances as the water routes between said Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States carried under similar conditions.

3. And what are the prevailing rates upon the principal commodities carried by vessels in the coastwise trade of the United States in comparison with such rates on similar commodities for similar distances carried by vessels in the foreign trade of the United States.

4. And what are the prevailing rates for transportation for similar commodities wholly by water by vessels not under United States registry for similar distances on similar commodities under similar conditions in comparison with the rates on commodities transported in the coastwise trade of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the Senate has already passed a resolution of this sort. What is the object of this, may I ask, now?

Mr. ADAMSON. That occurred since we reported this resolution, and it seemed to me, as the committee was getting up the information, we could just amend it and make it a House resolution.

Mr. MANN. I do not see any object in passing it at all. If there is any object, what is it? The Senate passed a similar resolution.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], the author of the resolution.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, the Senate put an amendment on it that left the commission a little more freedom than this does. I think it should be mandatory that they make this investigation and make a report of the same to Congress. I think it would be of great value, not only in legislating on the tolls question but on the entire rate question.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has committed himself on the tolls question and expects to have legislation before this report can be made.

Mr. HENRY. There is a lot of information that can be compiled and sent to this House that will be of great value on the rate question, on the stock-and-bond law, and other things, and I think if the Interstate Commerce Commission will furnish us the information it will be of great advantage.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the Interstate Commerce Commission has more work on its hands now than any other governmental institution or body in the world. It is very much behind with its work, has various cases pending before it which it ought to determine at the earliest possible moment. It has no knowledge or information itself about most of the matters called for in this resolution.

Mr. HENRY. If the gentleman will permit me just a moment, before introducing the resolution I talked with some members of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Permit me to read a letter from the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which, of course, reflects the views of the commission:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, April 14, 1914.

Hon. WILLIAM C. ADAMSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. ADAMSON: I presented to the commission in conference this morning your letter of the 8th, inclosing a copy of House concurrent resolution 35. I am directed by the commission to say that we see no objection to the passage of the resolution. Much of the information called for is already in the possession of the commission, and as soon as possible will be made available for use under the resolution. The other information, in case of the passage of the resolution, will be obtained by the commission so far as practicable and as promptly as possible.

I write this letter to confirm what I said to your secretary over the telephone this morning.

Very truly, yours, JAMES S. HARLAN, Chairman.

The commission is ready and willing to undertake this investigation. It will not take very long. They have some information at hand and other things within easy reach, and it will be compiled in such form that it will throw a flood of light on many important problems that are to be dealt with during the next two or three weeks in this House. So I hope the gentleman will not object to it. It does not bear alone on the tolls question, but on the general question of regulating freight rates and regulating common carriers, matters of very great importance to the people of the country.

After giving the subject considerable study and conferring with members of the commission, I am satisfied within two weeks or less time we will have information that we will be glad to have in our possession.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have had a long and intimate acquaintance with the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission and with many of the Interstate Commerce Commissioners. I know if this resolution should pass and they should make investigation in conformity with the spirit of it, they could not make a report inside of two or three years, and then they themselves would not make the investigation. They would employ some clerk or expert, or prejudiced or unprejudiced opinioned individual to make the investigation. The Interstate Commerce Commission has now work that it ought to perform which it is physically impossible for the members themselves to do and which they are required to turn over to employees.

But that is on the merits of the proposition. The Senate has already directed, though I do not think they have such authority, the commission to make this investigation, and if the commission wants to make it they will make it under the Senate resolution. The tolls question was the only excuse for it, possibly, in the first place, over in the Senate, and if the Senate wants the information after they have passed the tolls bill, very well.

Mr. HENRY. I had some other ideas besides the tolls question.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows the Interstate Commerce Commission does not have jurisdiction over the coastwise trading vessels of the United States, in the main.

Mr. HENRY. They have to a certain extent, you will recall.

Mr. MANN. They have to a very, very limited extent.

Mr. HENRY. Well, there was a provision in the act that we passed here several years ago providing that they should determine——

Mr. MANN. I drew the provision, and I know what it is.

Mr. HENRY. And I have read it frequently. They are to determine what ships are controlled by the railroads. That is their business under the amendment that the gentleman drew.

Mr. MANN. And this is to exercise certain control over vessels that carry freight part way in connection with another route, part of which is a railroad. Now, we had an investigation made by a very distinguished committee in this House, presided over by the very able gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], who probably can give us cards and spades, so far as information on this matter is concerned.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will say that I have sworn returns from all the railroads with reference to their ownership and control of ship lines in my files, and they will be available to the Interstate Commerce Commission or to the House, if necessary.

Mr. HENRY. But they have not been printed or compiled?

Mr. ALEXANDER. They are all in printed volumes in my office.

Mr. MANN. The committee made a long report on that case.

Mr. ALEXANDER. My cabinet is full of them. There are two or three hundred of those reports. We could not embody them all in our printed reports, but they are available to the House or the Interstate Commerce Commission. I am not opposing this resolution.

Mr. HENRY. I understand. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state that I talked with his expert, Dr. Hoebner, who stated that he did have a lot of this information, and much of it was given in a confidential way, and he would not feel authorized to release it, and it ought not to be published. Now, if we can get that confidential information and have it furnished to the Interstate Commerce Commission, it will be of very great value to this House and to the country; and I deem it important that we let this resolution pass, and let the Interstate Commerce Commission gather the facts from the reports and confidential files or from the files that have not been compiled, and put them in tangible form, so that we can take them up and study them.

Mr. MANN. The Interstate Commerce Commission is not the proper body to make an investigation of this kind. They do not have jurisdiction over these ships in the main. They can not make the investigation themselves. The members of the commission do not have the time. There is plenty of work for that commission to perform.

Mr. HENRY. They are willing to undertake it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, they are willing to undertake what Congress directs them to do, and they seldom will say publicly that they do not think it ought to be done, but privately they say that they do not think they ought to be required to make so many investigations, in which opinion I largely agree.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say one word in relation to the confidential nature of any information in the possession of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. It does not apply to any of these reports. We sent out about 3,000 inquiries to the principal shippers of this country with reference to their attitude toward the steamship conferences and agreements, and in order to protect them and to get a full and frank statement of their views on the subject we assured them that their names would not be disclosed, but that their statements, of course, would be used by the committee in making its report, and I may say that was done; but so far as the reports made by the railroads and steamship lines are concerned, they are available. And I will say, too, that the Interstate Commerce Commission officials have on a number of occasions sent to my committee room and I have given them access to the files, in connection with other questions that have been under consideration by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Illinois will withhold his objection, I want to say that one of the very sweetest morsels, one of the things that was rolled around the tongues of the Democratic free-toll repealers most, was the subject of the ship subsidy and the ship monopoly controlling rates. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] used that argument in his debate favoring the repeal of free tolls.

The gentleman from Texas, I believe, is entirely consistent in offering this resolution, which provides for an investigation to ascertain whether a ship monopoly exists. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and those who viewed the tolls matter with him did not give much credence to the argument that there was a shipping monopoly or that shipping interests would be benefited by free tolls, and the gentleman from Illinois, it seems to me, is very inconsistent in opposing this resolution. There is no reason why we should not investigate the matter. The people of the country—at least those who have confidence in the Democratic Party and the Democratic arguments that have been advanced in the ship tolls debate—believe there is a ship monopoly and that it will have much to do with the freight rates between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, and I see no reason why the Congress should not pass this resolution. I hope it will do so.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FALCONER] has not been long enough here to have gathered sufficient information to know very much about the Interstate Commerce Commission either in the past, present, or future.

Mr. FALCONER. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Speaker, that I have not been here for a great number of years, but I have been engaged in legislative work for some 10 years, and I admire the ability of the gentleman from Illinois; if his ability is exceeded by anything, it is by his nerve and his egotism.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withhold his objection for a moment.

Mr. MANN. I will do it as I did for the other gentleman—under personal abuse.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not charge any of that to any of us. I have not indulged in any such thing.

Mr. HENRY. Here is what I was going to say about this matter: This House needs in compact form the information called for in the resolution. I have said and do believe that there is a shipping monopoly, and that if the Interstate Commerce Commission is allowed to make an investigation and secure the names of the men who own the railroads and the ship lines it will be demonstrated when their names are laid before the House and the country that there is such monopoly controlled by certain railroads and ship companies.

Now, that is the first thing, to wit, calling for these names. In the next place the resolution calls for a comparison of rates charged in the coastwise shipping and on seagoing ships. That is to say, it will show that the ships engaged in the coastwise trade, in transporting similar commodities for similar distances and under similar conditions, secure five or six times as much in their freight charges as the ships on the high seas. In other words, where a ship on the high seas gets $5 per ton for the same distance upon the same commodities and under similar conditions the ships in the shipping trust get five or six times that amount.

Now, what we wish to do is to have the Interstate Commerce Commission look into these things and investigate them and report them to this House, and all these things that I have stated will be verified, and we will have them here for our benefit as we legislate. Why should we be afraid to face these facts? Why not get them? Why not let the Interstate Commerce Commission, with its experts, with its knowledge, give us all these facts, as I feel sure they exist? It is a very important resolution, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] ought not to stand in the way of it. With this tolls fight on in the Senate and in the country everywhere, he ought to be willing to discover every fact and all such transactions in order that we may thoroughly uncover this hideous monopoly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. I do.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Senate having passed a similar resolution calling for these very same facts, what advantage would be gained by the House passing this resolution to-day?

Mr. HENRY. The Senate passed a resolution asking the Interstate Commerce Commission to send out circulars and find out things. This resolution calls on the Interstate Commerce Commission to make a genuine investigation.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think that if the information which is sought for by the resolution is obtained, it will disclose a state of facts which will justify the action of the House in the repeal of the free-tolls proposition?

Mr. HENRY. I think it will absolutely demonstrate it, and prove it beyond the peradventure of a doubt.

Mr. MADDEN. Then I hope it will be passed.

Mr. HENRY. I hope so, too.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will ask the gentleman if he does not think the objection of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will be an admission on his part that we are right in that contention?

Mr. MANN. Since gentlemen have taken so much time to jump on me, I just want to say a word.

Mr. HENRY. I have not jumped on you.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], who is chairman of the Committee on Rules, who could have brought in a rule on this subject, as he has on others at various times, now seeks to put odium upon me for objecting to this resolution, which is silly on its face. The Interstate Commerce Commission is not the body to make the investigation. The gentleman says he wants the information for consideration on the tolls proposition.

Mr. HENRY. If you will stand out of the way, we will show whether it is silly or not.

Mr. MANN. I did not interrupt the gentleman. Can not the gentleman be quiet for a moment!

The resolution is silly. So far as obtaining this information for consideration on the tolls question, the House has passed the tolls bill with the aid of the gentleman. I did not vote for it. The information contained in this resolution can not be secured by the Interstate Commerce Commission inside of several years. If there be a shipping trust in violation of the Sherman antitrust law, as gentlemen have stated, why does not the Attorney General prosecute it, insead of the gentleman endeavoring to give immunity to it by having an investigation and calling them to testify. I do not know whether there is a shipping trust or not, but if there is I do not want to give immunity to the men who are engaged in it. The Democratic Attorney General had better be engaged in prosecuting this shipping trust which so many gentlemen allege to exist. I do not know. I heard many distinguished gentlemen say they favored the repeal of the tolls-exemption bill because a shipping trust would get the benefit of tolls exemption. If there is a shipping trust, why does not somebody prosecute it? We will give to the Attorney General all the money he wants for all the men he wants to make investigations of this kind and to prosecute the offenders. I am perfectly willing to give to any commission or committee the power to make a proper investigation by proper officials.

Mr. HENRY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. HENRY. You say you will give to the Attorney General all the power and money he wants. Why not give him these facts, that the Interstate Commerce Commission say they are ready and willing to give the House, and then we can furnish them to the Attorney General. Why stand in the way of it for a moment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman withhold his objection just a moment?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. In view of what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] said about a so-called "shipping trust," I desire to read to the House what a very distinguished Democrat had to say on that subject in a speech in the Senate on Saturday last. I refer to the great speech of Senator WALSH of Montana, a distinguished Democrat, who was the secretary of the committee on resolutions which prepared and reported the platform of the last Democratic National Convention, a committee of which Mr. Bryan, now Secretary of State, was also a member. Senator WALSH was also the secretary and Mr. Bryan a member of the subcommittee of 11 which first adopted the plank for the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise traffic passing through the Panama Canal. The Senator was likewise the secretary and Mr. Bryan a member of the subcommittee of four selected to put the platform into appropriate form and language.

The Senator declared that two circumstances fastened themselves upon his mind, indicating that the plank exempting our coastwise traffic from the payment of tolls had the particular attention of the committee aside from the attention that was necessarily given it in the reading of the entire platform. He said that when the tolls plank was presented Mr. Bryan expressed his approval, and then suggested an additional plank excluding railroad-owned ships, and it was adopted in the following language:

> We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by railroad carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

And the Senator from Montana called particular attention to the word "also"—we "also" favor—in the resolution of Mr. Bryan, which word clearly shows that Mr. Bryan had in mind and approved the tolls-exemption plank when he suggested the plank which follows it.

I will now read the Senator's words concerning the alleged shipping trust. I commend this masterly speech to every Member of the House:

> Of a piece with the talk about subsidy is the appeal to popular prejudice by ascribing to some mythical "shipping trust" the enjoyment of the advantages accruing from the existing act.
> What is this "shipping trust" which is to send its vessels through the Panama Canal from our ports on the Atlantic to our ports on the Pacific? Who is at the head of it? By what name is it known? What is the nature of its organization?
> Reference is made to the report of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries to the effect that 92 per cent of the coastwise shipping is controlled either by railroads or by combinations of one kind or another, the fact being that it referred entirely to line steamers and not to tramps at all. How much of that 92 per cent will go through the canal? It includes the greater part of the shipping on the Great Lakes. It includes the barges and ferries that connect the railroad termini at Jersey City with New York. It includes the craft that carry railroad cars between the Virginia Capes. It includes the Southern Pacific steamers that ply between New Orleans and New York. Why particularize further? There are, according to Prof. Emory R. Johnson, who gives facts here, not opinions, now in existence steamers that are likely to make use of the canal in the coastwise trade, 24 of the American Hawaiian Line; 3 of the Grace Line; and 6 belonging to the United States, operated by the Isthmian Canal Commission or the Panama Railroad Co. That is all that will engage in the general trade.

I stop reading from the speech of the distinguished Democratic Senator to remind gentlemen that by the law which you seek to repeal, and to which reference was made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], ships owned or controlled by railroad carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal are prohibited from going through the canal, and that ships owned or controlled in violation of the Sherman antitrust law are also prohibited from going through the canal.

I desire now to finish this quotation from the eminent Democrat, who was a member of the committee on platform in the last Democratic national convention in company with the present distinguished Secretary of State.

Mr. HENRY. I want to inject right there——

Mr. COOPER. I do not want the gentleman to inject anything, because I am now reading from a good Democratic speech, with the accent on the good. [Laughter.] He continues:

> There are, besides, 44 tank steamers, fitted only for carrying oil, and 32 tramps. If any other ships enter into the coastwise trade through the canal, they must be built or taken out of the service in which they are now employed, presumably profitably.
> Talk of a "shipping trust" in this connection may pass upon the hustings or in the rural press, but indulgence in it in this body does not add to the dignity of the discussion nor to the enlightenment it may afford.

I ask the especial attention of our Democratic friends to that last paragraph.

Mr. HENRY. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. COOPER. Before I yield I want to direct attention to the Senator's close analysis of the testimony given before the Senate committee by men who knew all about the ships of the United States, by whom they are owned, and which of them could, under existing law, go through the Panama Canal. Witnesses of vast experience testified that 85 per cent of the tonnage of the world is carried in tramps and only 15 per cent in liners, so called. They testified that wheat and flour are carried abroad almost exclusively in tramp ships. The report of the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to the effect that 92 per cent of the coastwise shipping is controlled either by railroads or by combinations of one kind or another, referred entirely to line steamers and not to tramp ships at all. Now, if 92 per cent of the line steamers engaged in coastwise trade are controlled by railroads or unlawful combinations, then the existing law absolutely excludes those 92 per cent from entering the canal if they belong to roads that compete with the canal.

Let me again state the facts. That 92 per cent includes what? It includes the shipping on the Great Lakes. Of course, that shipping is not going through the canal. It includes the barges and ferries that connect the railroad termini at Jersey City with New York; of course, those are not going through the canal. That 92 per cent includes also the craft that carry railroad cars between the Virginia Capes; of course, that craft is not going through the Panama Canal. The 92 per cent includes the Southern Pacific steamers that ply between New Orleans and New York. They are not going through the Panama Canal because owned by railroads competing with the canal, and therefore prohibited from entering it.

Mr. HENRY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. HENRY. I will give the gentleman some information that he has not received.

Mr. COOPER. I have not control of the time.

Mr. HENRY. I want to say this to the House, if it will indulge me. In regard to what the Senator from Montana had to say in his speech, I have this to remark, and we might as well meet it and be candid about it now as later on. What really occurred at the Baltimore convention was this——

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. HENRY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Was the gentleman on the subcommittee of four?

Mr. HENRY. Never mind; I have the information.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman was not on either subcommittee, and he can not know the facts.

Mr. HENRY. I am going to give you information which I have received.

Mr. COOPER. That is absolutely hearsay. The gentleman was not on the committee, and what he repeats will be hearsay, and I refuse to receive it as against the statement of the secretary of the committee.

Mr. HENRY. Will not the gentleman allow me to give the House the information?

Mr. COOPER. I object to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HENRY. Oh, that is unfair.

Mr. COOPER. I object unless the gentleman can give us some direct evidence.

Mr. MANN. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. HENRY. Not more than five minutes.

The SPEAKER. This discussion is proceeding by unanimous consent. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HENRY. Now, what occurred at the Baltimore convention was this: I was a delegate and was on the rostrum when the platform came up for consideration. When they got down to a certain point in the platform committee report, the Secretary of State suggested that in dealing with the accomplishments of the Democratic House of Representatives they enumerate those things that had been written into law by the Democracy. So in a certain part of the platform you will find the achievements of the Democratic Party incorporated. The Secretary of State was willing for other gentlemen to make the enumeration. When it got to the question of a subsidy, some gentleman slipped one over on the delegates at another place in the platform. [Laughter.] And they did not put the free-tolls measure in the enumeration of what the Democratic House had done. When the subject of the merchant marine was reached, the Secretary of State, believing the Democratic House had really provided that coastwise ships should go through the canal free, allowed it to go through, thinking it had passed by a Democratic majority. Such was not and is not the case. The Secretary of State said to me that if he had known that a majority of the Democrats in the House had voted against it there should not have been any provision for it in the platform.

Mr. BRYAN. Had President Wilson found that out when he made his speech two weeks later?

Mr. HENRY. That is the literal truth, and those who favor a subsidy need not think that they are making any capital by controverting that point. The Democratic Party is against subsidies, and we follow that faith of the Democracy. We do not follow the one that was put in another isolated part of the platform.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that the free tolls and the subsidy are in the same plank.

Mr. HENRY. It is not in the same plank; it is in a different place.

Mr. MANN. Then I happen to be more familiar with the platform than the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HENRY. I read the platform only yesterday, and free tolls does not appear under the enumeration of the things done by the Democratic House.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; but it appears in the same plank as the subsidy.

Mr. HENRY. Yes, it does; but in a different place from the enumeration of the Democratic achievements. I was talking about the plank recounting achievements of the Democratic Party.

Mr. MANN. They have no achievements. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. HENRY. And still you gentlemen run to cover on this resolution. You let the resolution pass and we will show you by the report which the Interstate Commerce Commission makes that, although ships owned by railroads or combinations are not to pass through the Panama Canal, they have not accomplished anything of benefit to the American people, because the report will show that the same man or set of men that finance the railroad are financing the ship monopoly as well; that the same hand furnishes the money to both of them; and although your Interstate Commerce Commission report that they have separated them, and that these ships in a certain class shall not go through, yet they are within the same dominion of financial control. Let us get the names of these men. Let the resolution pass and we will show you the personnel of the men who control the ship monopoly and the railroads.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin that it seems to me that if he will read the entire evidence taken before the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, that, whether the Senator from Montana says there is no shipping trust or not, he will agree that the shipping routes of this country are dominated by the shipping combinations.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman from Texas misunderstood the quotation from the speech of the Senator from Montana. The Senator referred to the report of the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to the effect that 92 per cent of the line steamers engaged in coastwise traffic are dominated by the railroads——

Mr. HARDY. No; railroads and trusts.

Mr. COOPER. Yes; railroads and combinations. But the law of August, 1912, expressly excludes such ships from the canal, so what is there in the contention of the gentlemen on that side of the aisle? Ships that are owned by trusts in violation of the Sherman antitrust law and ships owned by railroads which are competitors of the canal are not to be permitted to go through the canal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend for a moment. All of this talk on both sides of the aisle is by unanimous consent. There is nothing pending, and if the gentleman from Wisconsin desires to proceed, he will have to do what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] did—ask unanimous consent.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is too late.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I was on my feet.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was not making much noise about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. I shall not object, Mr. Speaker; but I will object to any further extension.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I will have to object now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is too late.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, just as soon as the gentleman from Maryland reserved the right to object——

The SPEAKER. But he did not reserve the right to object. He said he served notice that he was going to object.

Mr. HARDY. But, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair had already ruled that he was too late.

Mr. HARDY. The Chair will permit me to be heard for a moment on the question of parliamentary practice?

The SPEAKER. For a moment; yes.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maryland rose, and was held not to be too late.

The SPEAKER. The Chair distinctly held that he was too late.

Mr. HARDY. I thought the Chair permitted him to reserve the point of order.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

Mr. COOPER. I am the regular order. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin has five minutes.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I wish our friends on the other side of the aisle to listen to this great Democratic Senator from Montana.

Mr. HARDY. But we can not reply.

Mr. COOPER. He was the secretary of the platform committee in your national convention, a committee and a convention of which the present Secretary of State was a most important member. Says that distinguished Senator referring to the tolls plank:

> Neither am I disposed to listen with any patience to the view that the obnoxious plank is contrary to the time-honored principle of the Democratic Party against a subsidy. I have no disposition to expose myself to the disrespect of any man who gives thought to the subject at all by advancing any such preposterous argument.

He calls your "subsidy" talk "preposterous."

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I can not.

Mr. HARDY. Then I make the point of order that it is not proper for the gentleman to refer to a discussion in the Senate at this time.

Mr. COOPER. But I am not commenting upon it.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken. The Chair would have sustained it 15 minutes ago if it had been made.

Mr. HARDY. I only make it now because we have no opportunity to reply.

Mr. COOPER. Am I not permitted to read from a speech, if I refrain from comments?

The SPEAKER. No; the rule is the other way.

Mr. COOPER. Then, Mr. Speaker, I desire to make an argument of my own.

The SPEAKER. Very well.

Mr. COOPER. And it is a very able argument, I think, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is commenting on the speech by saying what sort of an argument it is.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin said he was going to make an argument of his own, and that it was a good argument.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I do not want this taken out of my time.

The SPEAKER. No; it will not be taken out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have four minutes and a half left. [Laughter.]

> So, if tolls exemption be a subsidy, we are going to continue subsidizing shipping, whatever be the fate of the pending bill. If the term "subsidy" is applicable to the case at all, the question is——

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman can not read from a speech in the Senate and call it his speech.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, the statement that I have just made is one in the truth of which I firmly believe. What I am reading expresses perfectly my views.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not get down and investigate to see whether the gentleman is reading from a Senator's speech or making his own speech. The Chair has stated what the rule is. The rule is frequently violated, so far as that is concerned, but when it is invoked the gentleman can not quote from a Senator or talk about a Senator.

Mr. MANN. He is not doing either one.

The SPEAKER. If he is not doing either one, he is not violating the rule.

Mr. HARDY. I wish to say that it appeared by ocular demonstration that the gentleman was reading. I do not know whether he was reading or not.

The SPEAKER. He may be reading the Bible, for all the Chair knows.

Mr. HARDY. On the ground that it may be the Bible, I withdraw the objection. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER. He says—[laughter]—I refer to the gentleman from Texas [laughter], that by ocular demonstration I am reading. The gentleman ought to listen and learn the truth through auricular demonstration. Mr. Speaker, this is not to be taken out of my time. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman is doing it all himself, and I do not know why it should not come out of his time.

Mr. COOPER. This Senator says—

We appropriate millions annually for the improvement of rivers and harbors. We must desist because we are subsidizing the shipping interests which make use of these improvements free, as will our coastwise shipping under the act that has recently evoked so much hue and cry about subsidy. As if these considerations did not make the proposition sufficiently ridiculous, the tariff act, in which we all take so much pride, contains a provision under which goods brought to our ports in American bottoms enter at a rate of duty 5 per cent less than those specified in the various schedules. The result to the Government is exactly the same—

Mr. HENRY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I can not now.

The result to the Government is exactly the same as though the nominal rates were exacted and then a payment of 5 per cent of the amount collected made to the American shipowner. In a sense, though by no means in any exact sense, this is a subsidy—quite as near being a subsidy as is the exemption granted by the canal act to coastwise shipping. Yet the Democratic committees of both Houses conceived the idea, the Democratic caucuses of both Houses approved of it, the Democratic Members of both Houses voted for it, and the Democratic President gave it his sanction in signing the historic measure of which it is a part.

But according to your new views that 5 per cent reduction in rates was and is a 5 per cent subsidy in favor of American ships. You who are cheering so loudly voted for that subsidy. And yet now claiming that you can not vote to give a preference to American coastwise vessels in the canal for the pretended reason that it would be a subsidy, you deliberately repudiate your party platform and all the arguments and promises in its support made before the election by you and by your candidate for the Presidency. If your platform had declared against tolls exemption on coastwise trade, could your party have carried Oregon? No. You repudiate your platform and your promises because you say tolls exemption on American ships is a subsidy, and yet there is absolutely no distinction in principle, Mr. Speaker, between that 5 per cent reduction provided for in the Democratic tariff act on goods coming in American ships and the exemption from canal tolls of American coastwise ships.

Let us not invite——

Mr. HENRY. From what is the gentleman reading?

Mr. COOPER (continuing):

Let us not invite the imputation of hypocrisy by shouting "subsidy." That kind of subsidy is as old as our Government. It had the approval of Jefferson and every Democratic administration down to Jackson's time. The First Congress, which convened in 1789, gave a preference to American ships by fixing the rate of duty on imports brought in by them at 10 per cent less than those entering in foreign vessels.

President George Washington signed that law.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. While this is fresh in the minds of Members, the Chair will read to the House the rule which is frequently violated. This is from Jefferson's Manual, section 364:

It is a breach of order in debate to notice what has been said on the same subject in the other House, or the particular votes or majorities on it there; because the opinion of each House should be left to its own independency, not to be influenced by the proceedings of the other, and the quoting them might beget reflections leading to a misunderstanding between the two Houses.

Then in a footnote Mr. HINDS says:

This rule of the parliamentary law is in use in the House of Representatives to the full extent of its provisions, and it has always been held a breach of order to refer to debates or votes on the same subject in the other House.

And so forth.

This is a practice that ought to be observed, and the reason is, it is likely to lead to bad feeling.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair permit a parliamentary question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to ask the Speaker whether he considers it to be a violation of the rule if a Member of the House, in a speech, should refer to a speech made elsewhere without stating by whom it was made or where it was made, but yet quoting a speech or a portion of a speech made in the Senate?

The SPEAKER. Why, if he is really quoting the speech, he is trying to evade the inhibition.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair permit me a word of personal explanation? I did not desire to exclude the gentleman from Wisconsin from reading the speech. I only did so because I understood that there would be no chance to reply to his comment.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman want any time?

Mr. HARDY. No. I am now under notice in regard to it, and I want to get through, anyhow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

AMENDMENT TO SECTION 4472, REVISED STATUTES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 14377) to amend section 4472 of the Revised Statutes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4472 of the Revised Statutes of the United States of America be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following provision:

"Provided, however, That nothing in the foregoing or following sections of this act shall prohibit the transportation and use by vessels carrying passengers or freight for hire of gasoline or any of the products of petroleum for the operation of engines to supply an auxiliary lighting and wireless system independent of the vessel's main power plant: Provided further, That the transportation or use of such gasoline or any of the products of petroleum shall be under such regulations as shall be prescribed by the board of supervising inspectors, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, for the purpose of giving the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] an opportunity to state just what is expected to be accomplished by the enactment of this amendment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Section 4472 of the Revised Statutes, enacted March 3, 1905, provides in part:

No loose hay, loose cotton, or loose hemp, camphene, nitroglycerin, naphtha, benzine, benzole, coal oil, crude or refined petroleum, or other like explosive burning fluids, or like dangerous articles shall be carried as freight, or used as stores on any steamer carrying passengers. * * *

Now, by the act of July 23, 1912, section 1 of the "Act to require apparatus and operators for radiocommunication on certain ocean steamers, approved June 24, 1910," was amended so as to provide among other things:

An auxiliary power supply, independent of the vessel's main electric power plant, must be provided which will enable the sending set for at least four hours to send messages over a distance of at least 100 miles, day or night. * * *

Mr. MADDEN. This just provides the necessary material to establish the power?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to H. R. 11317, which was passed this morning without prejudice. I have just obtained the data for which I left the Chamber this morning and want to explain why I make this request——

Mr. MANN. I shall have to object to that.

Mr. GRAY. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes to state the facts relative to this bill going over and why I am able now——

Mr. MANN. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects to that.

Mr. MANN. We took care of the gentleman's bill by not striking it from the calendar.

Mr. GRAY. When I explain that the chairman of the subcommittee reporting the bill has been and is still absent from——

The SPEAKER. No; the gentleman from Illinois objects to the unanimous consent for the gentleman to address the House.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, when this matter was up, the gentleman from Indiana had to go over to get the papers. He was in the House this morning——

Mr. MADDEN. I object to that, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. That is out of order. The Clerk will report the next bill.

COLLISIONS IN RIVERS AND HARBORS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 15605) to amend an act entitled "An act to adopt regulations for preventing collisions upon certain harbors, rivers, and inland waters of the United States," approved June 7, 1897.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the act approved June 7, 1897, entitled "An act to adopt regulations for preventing collisions upon certain harbors, rivers, and inland waters of the United States," be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the supervising inspector of steam vessels and the Supervising Inspector General shall establish such rules to be observed by steam vessels in passing each other, and as to the lights to be carried by ferryboats, and by barges and canal boats when in tow of steam vessels, and as to the lights and day signals to be carried by vessels marking a wreck or other obstruction to navigation, or moored for submarine operations, or made fast to a sunken object which may drift with the tide or be towed, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, as they from time to time may deem necessary for safety, which rules, when approved by the Secretary of Commerce, are hereby declared special rules duly made by local authority, as provided for in article 30 of chapter 802 of the laws of 1890. Two printed copies of such rules shall be furnished to such ferryboats and steam vessels, which rules shall be kept posted up in conspicuous places in such vessels."

Also the following committee amendments were read:

Strike out the word "inspector," in the eighth line of page 1, and insert in lieu thereof the word "inspectors."

Insert, after the word "ferryboats," in the eleventh line of page 2 of the printed bill, the following: "barges, canal boats"; so that it will read: "ferryboats, barges, canal boats, and steam vessels."

Also further amend by striking out the period at the end of the word "vessels," in line 13, on page 2, and insert a comma and the words "barges, and boats."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does not the board of steamboat inspectors now make regulations for the passage of ships on the lakes and in navigable waters controlled by the Government of the United States, and in what particular way or to what extent will this language change that authority?

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] that the supervising inspectors of steam vessels and Supervising Inspector General have now power to make rules and regulations to a certain extent. It appears from the law that they have not the power to make rules and regulations providing warning signals for vessels working on wrecks or other obstructions to navigation, or for vessels working on submarine operations. For that reason it is necessary to so amend the law as to give this power in such cases to the supervising inspectors of steam vessels.

Mr. MADDEN. Then this amendment does not propose to enlarge the authority of inspectors of steamboats to make regulations for the navigation of the ships, but simply to provide for a condition which does not now exist?

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Exactly. It provides for warning signals.

Mr. MADDEN. It does not change the regulations already in existence, except as to the specified cases provided in this amendment?

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. That is all, sir.

Mr. MADDEN. I have no objection to it, then.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, how does this question come to arise?

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. It comes to arise in this manner: It appears that the Chapman & Merritt Wrecking Co. is engaged in laying submarine aqueduct pipes from Long Island to Staten Island, across the Narrows at New York Harbor. That harbor, as everyone knows, is frequented by hundreds of vessels every day, going back and forth, and this work at that point will continue, it is estimated, for more than a year. The matter was presented to the Secretary of Commerce by the representatives of this dredging company, and it was ascertained then that there was no provision in law requiring them to carry any given signal which would be different from other marine signals. I desire further to say that the Secretary of Commerce, in a letter to the chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, explained this matter fully and urged the speedy adoption of this amendment. I will say that the amendment, of course, is of general application.

Mr. MOORE. It will be of general application?

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Yes, sir; it is so stated in the report.

Mr. MOORE. And it arises owing to this condition in New York Harbor?

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. And it sort of emphasizes the fact that this gap is in the law.

Mr. MOORE. What is the reason for bringing this amendment in here?

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. I will say to the gentlemen, that if there is no objection to the consideration of the bill at this time I propose to move for the consideration of the Senate bill in lieu of the House bill. The Senate bill is similar to the House bill.

Mr. MOORE. The calendar number of the Senate bill is 143, and it is called "An act to provide for warning signals for vessels working on wrecks or engaged in dredging or other submarine work." Substantially all of the bill and all of the reports seem to be the same. It is not intended to press both measures?

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. No, sir. At the proper time I propose to ask that the Senate bill be considered in lieu of the House bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, there is upon the Unanimous Consent Calendar the Senate bill 5289, or No. 143 on the calendar, which is a bill exactly similar to the House bill now under consideration. It has passed the Senate, and it is the wish of your Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and also of the Secretary of Commerce, to expedite matters as much as possible. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill 5289 be considered now, in lieu of the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BURKE] asks unanimous consent that the Senate bill of similar tenor to the House bill be considered in lieu of the House bill.

Mr. MANN. Let it be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate bill. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin know the calendar number?

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. It is No. 143 on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman to say that the Senate bill is on the Unanimous Consent Calendar?

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. It is.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 5289) to provide for warning signals for vessels working on wrecks or engaged in dredging or other submarine work.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the act approved June 7, 1897, entitled "An act to adopt regulations for preventing collisions upon certain harbors, rivers, and inland waters of the United States," be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the supervising inspectors of steam vessels and the Supervising Inspector General shall establish such rules to be observed by steam vessels in passing each other and as to the lights to be carried by ferryboats and by barges and canal boats when in tow of steam vessels, and as to the lights and day signals to be carried by vessels marking a wreck or other obstruction to navigation or moored for submarine operations, or made fast to a sunken object which may drift with the tide or be towed, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, as they from time to time may deem necessary for safety, which rules when approved by the Secretary of Commerce are hereby declared special rules duly made by local authority, as provided for in article 30 of chapter 802 of the laws of 1890. Two printed copies of such rules shall be furnished to such ferryboats and steam vessels, which rules shall be kept posted up in conspicuous places in such vessels."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to considering the Senate bill just reported in lieu of the House bill of similar tenor? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, there are certain amendments that were submitted by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries to the Senate bill. I desire to say at this time, Mr. Speaker, that since the reporting of the Senate bill with amendments we received two separate communications—one from the Superintendent of the Bureau of Lighthouses and one from Mr. Chamberlain, of the Bureau of Navigation, in which they suggested two other slight amendments, so that now I think the proper way to do is to withdraw the committee amendments as reported and submit the following amendments on behalf of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Has the House committee ever considered the Senate bill?

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. It has been reported.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the vote by which the third reading of the House bill was ordered will be vacated.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin suggests——

Mr. MANN. The committee amendments were not acted upon. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BURKE] can offer his amendment as a substitute.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. No. 1.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Senate bill 5289 as passed by the Senate by striking out, after the word "by," in the first line of page 2, the words "marking a wreck" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "dredges of all types and vessels working on wrecks and by," and placing a comma after the word "by," in the first line of page 2.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. What report has the Clerk got on this bill? Is it the Senate bill 5289? What has he there? There is no such amendment in the copy that I have.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. I do not understand the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. These are not the committee amendments.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. No, sir. I asked the privilege of withdrawing the committee amendments.

Mr. MANN. I know; but I objected to withdrawing the committee amendments. Now I have no objection. I would like to have this amendment reported again. I thought it was reported as the first committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Senate bill 5289 as it passed the Senate by striking out, after the word "by," in the first line of page 2, the words "marking a wreck" and inserting in lieu thereof the following words——

Mr. MANN. On what page and line is that?

The Clerk read as follows:

By striking out the word "by" in the first line of page 2 of the Senate bill.

Mr. MANN. There is no such language there. I do not see how you can amend and strike out language that is not there.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, there may be a difference in some of these prints; but I specifically, in the amendment, called attention to line 1 of the Senate bill as it passed the Senate.

Mr. MANN. I know; but the gentleman knows that when an amendment of this sort is offered and it goes to the enrolling room they can not enroll it at some other place than where it is offered, and it ought to be offered in the right place.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. This is offered in the right place.

Mr. MANN. It is certainly not in the right place, page 2, line 1.

Mr. STAFFORD Can not the gentleman indicate on the Senate bill as reported by his committee? You will find it on page 2, lines 3 and 4. There is this language, "marking a wreck." Is that the language that the gentleman refers to?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has an idea that the amendment is being offered as a substitute.

Mr. MANN. This is not the correct place.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is trying to help everybody out of the muddle by stating what the muddle is about.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I desire to explain this, that when the bill was reported back from the House, in the reprinting of it the words of certain lines in the Senate bill as it was passed were in different lines in the bill when reprinted after being reported from our committee. I noticed that when I was drawing the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Very well.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. I specifically provide that it was to be an amendment on line 1 of the Senate bill after the word "by" on page 2.

Mr. STAFFORD. In this print the gentleman will find it on line 3, page 2, after the word "by," preceding "vessels."

Mr. MOORE. Succeeding "vessels marking a wreck."

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. In the Senate bill reported from the House committee it is after the word "by" in the third line.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Senate bill 5289 as it passed the Senate by striking out, after the word "by" in the first line of page 2, the following words: "marking a wreck" and inserting in lieu thereof the following words: "dredges of all types and vessels working on wrecks and by," and place a comma after the word "by" in the first line of page 2.

Mr. MANN. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. In the copy of the act which I have the first word after the word "by" is "vessels." Yet the gentleman has offered an amendment to strike out after the word "by" the words "marking a wreck."

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman wishes to strike out the words "marking a wreck."

Mr. MANN. Let the gentleman tell what he wants. I want to have the amendment reported so that we can understand it.

The SPEAKER. What suggestion has the gentleman from Illinois to make?

Mr. MANN. I am trying to find out where the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BURKE] wants it to come in. He proposes to strike out a word after a word that does not exist in the bill.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I want to strike out the word "marking" and put in "working on a wreck."

Mr. MANN. That comes in after the word "vessels."

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The language reads "to be carried by vessels marking a wreck."

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. MANN. You do not want to strike it out after the word "by," because it does not follow the word "by."

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Yes; it means after "vessels."

Mr. MANN. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, by striking out, after the word "vessels," in the first lines of page 2, the following words: "marking a wreck," and insert in lieu thereof the following words: "dredges of all types, and vessels working on wrecks, and by," and place a comma after the word "by" in the first line of page 2.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I should like to inquire if the Clerk has the bill that passed the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk has the engrossed copy of the bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER. And is that reference to the first line on page 2 correct?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I want to take one whack at this. I think the gentleman is mistaken, and that what he wanted to do was to strike out the words "vessels marking a wreck," and then make the insertion that he spoke of, so that he would make the insertion after the word "by."

Mr. MOORE. Let it be reported as amended.

Mr. HARDY. I ask the Clerk to read the sentence as it would be when amended.

Mr. MOORE. Beginning with section 2.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Clerk will report it as it will read if amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the lights and day signals to be carried by vessels, dredges of all types, and vessels working on wrecks, and by.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that the amendment as originally handed up by me is correct. The words "vessels marking a wreck" should be stricken out.

Mr. MOORE. May we have the section read as proposed to be amended?

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Clerk will again report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the lights and day signals to be carried by vessels, dredges of all types, and vessels working on wrecks, and by other obstructions to navigation, or moored for submarine operations.

Mr. HARDY. The words intended to be inserted are properly reported, but the words intended to be stricken out should include the word "vessels" also.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BURKE], in charge of the bill, state whether that is correct?

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. It ought to be:

Strike out the words "vessels marking a wreck," and substitute therefor the words "dredges of all types, and vessels working on wrecks, and by."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it that way.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the lights and day signals to be carried by dredges of all kinds, and vessels working on wrecks, and by.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. That is correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that it may be reported now as amended.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the lights and day signals to be carried by dredges of all types, and vessels working on wrecks, and by other obstructions to navigation, or moored for submarine operations.

Mr. STAFFORD. That does not make sense, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. The word "by" in the amendment may be stricken out now.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the amendment as it should be.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the lights and day signals to be carried by dredges of all types, and vessels working on wrecks, and.

Mr. MOORE. I want to ask the gentleman if it is intended to strike out the words "ferryboats, barges, and canal boats," because that is what it would seem to do.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. No; the striking out is of the words "vessels marking a wreck," and the insertion is "dredges of all types, and vessels working on wrecks."

Mr. MOORE. That does not comport with the bill I have in my hand. The amendment would not fit in at all. It would be a mere jumble.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. The gentleman probably has the bill as it was printed after being reported to the House, and not the bill as it passed the Senate.

Mr. MOORE. I would not like to object to the gentleman's proposition, but it seems to me we ought to have the bill in proper shape.

Mr. STAFFORD. I should like to ask the gentleman whether the word "or" should not still be retained. As the amendment is reported by the Clerk it strikes out the word "or." Now, as I gather from the gentleman's statement, he wishes to have the language read as follows:

Signals to be carried by dredges of all types, and vessels working on wrecks or other obstructions to navigation, or moored.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the word "or" should be retained and not stricken out as last reported by the Clerk. The word "or" should be substituted for "and," so as to read "or other obstructions to navigation."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman offer that as an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment. We do not want to be passing amendments without knowing what they are.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 2 of the amendment strike out the word "or."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] intend that the word "or" shall be part of the amendment offered by his colleague [Mr. BURKE]?

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood that as the amendment was reported by the Clerk the last word was "and." Instead of that it should be "or," so as to carry out the intention of this bill.

The SPEAKER. Those in favor of changing the word "and" to the word "or" will say aye. Those opposed will say no.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BURKE] as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting, after the word "ferryboats," in line 11, page 2, the words "barges, dredges, canal boats, vessels working on wrecks," and place a comma after the word "ferryboats," in line 11.

Mr. MADDEN. I should like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin just what that means.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. This amendment refers to the posting of notices pertaining to these regulations in different boats. As the statute now stands——

Mr. MADDEN. As the statute now stands it does not require the posting of these notices?

Mr. MANN. It requires the notice on ferryboats and steam vessels.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Ferryboats and steam vessels; and on account of the change in the text above, it is necessary that the notices should be posted on barges and vessels working on wrecks.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Amend Senate bill by inserting, after the word "vessels," in line 13, page 2, the following words: "barges, dredges, and boats," and place a comma after the word "vessels."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The title was amended.

PATENT TO JOHN RUSSELL.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill S. 1243, an act directing the issuance of a patent to John Russell.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a patent under the homestead laws be issued to John Russell for the land occupied by him situated approximately in sections 4 and 5 of township 13 north, range 13 east of the Willamette meridian, in the Mount Rainier Forest Reserve, State of Washington, notwithstanding any withdrawal heretofore made affecting the same, upon his submitting satisfactory proof of the agricultural character of said lands and his compliance with the homestead laws applicable thereto: Provided, however, That patent shall not issue until said lands have been surveyed by metes and bounds under the direction of the surveyor general for the State of Washington.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I find in the report that the Acting Secretary of Agriculture says that the land is valuable for reclamation purposes and virtually makes a dissenting report upon this bill. I would like to have some explanation why the bill is asked to be passed under such circumstances.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Speaker, I think I can give the gentleman the information. This man John Russell went into a mountain valley in Kittitas County, Wash., 30 years ago—in 1884. He settled as a squatter. The land was unsurveyed. He made his home there until such time as the forest reserve was established. At the time he went there there had been no such thing as a forest reservation thought of.

The land was never surveyed and he never had a chance to file on it. After the forest reserve was established he went to the forest-reserve people, who acknowledged the justice of his claim and would have granted his request and allowed him to file, but before they got ready to act and have the land surveyed it was set aside with other lands for a reservoir site in a new scheme that had come in under the reclamation act. Of course that was long after the man had settled on the land. When he made application to have the land surveyed, the reclamation people decided against him, not that he had no right under the law but because they thought it should be set aside as a reservoir site.

Mr. STAFFORD. How much land is involved?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. One hundred and sixty acres.

Mr. STAFFORD. I find from the report that—

An examination of the land was made at that time, but there appears from the records of the case to have been some difficulty in reconciling Mr. Russell to the limitations of the act of June 11, 1906—that is, 160 acres.

From my reading of the report of the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture it appears that Mr. Russell once had an opportunity of making a selection of 160 acres, but he was not satisfied, because the amount of land that he had squatted upon was larger. Then later the land was reserved from settlement, and now, according to the uncontradicted statement of the department officials, the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture and the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, they say that the land is valuable and is needed in connection with an irrigation project.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. For a reservoir site.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why should he surrender the title when it is necessary for a site for reservoir purposes?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let me ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if this man had a good title, under the irrigation act, if they decided they needed it for a reservoir site, would they not have to either purchase it or condemn it? This man should have the same right to this place that he has lived on for 30 years as he would have if he had settled on it under the laws of the United States and received his patent.

Mr. STAFFORD. But he wanted more than 160 acres.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not know about that.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Where the law provides that a patent under the homestead laws be issued, can there be a patent issued for more than 160 acres?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not think so.

Mr. MANN. So, as a matter of fact, that patent of this land was offered to him—160 acres—and he would not take it. If he had taken it, and we wanted the land back, we would have to buy it and charge it up as a part of the Reclamation Service; and that is all that this bill proposes to do.

Mr. STAFFORD. There would be considerable delay before the Government could get hold of the land.

Mr. MANN. Oh, not at all; it is for a reservoir site, and they can not use it until they construct the other works.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is in the future, allow me to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let me read a line from the report for the benefit of the House:

It appears from his report, however, that it is regarded as a necessary part of the complete irrigation development of the Yakima project, and the director feels that the water users in the project should not be charged with the expenditure which would result from the acquisition of the land by purchase or condemnation should patent issue to Mr. Russell.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. This man is an old man. He settled on this place and worked on it long before reclamation projects or forest reserves were heard of. Why should he be denied a title to it?

Mr. STAFFORD. He only had a squatter's right.

Mr. MANN. He had rights under the law, and they are rights under the statutes of the United States.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Here is the law; and the gentleman from Wisconsin will find that a squatter has as much right to land as anybody else.

Mr. MANN. The law gives him a right to go on the land.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do we have the positive assurance of the gentleman from Washington that this resolution will only give him 160 acres and no more?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; and gentlemen will understand that he has valuable improvements on this land.

Mr. STAFFORD. His valuable improvements are nothing more than log houses and some other log buildings.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. He is an old man and has nothing in the world to leave to his children except this land and buildings.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Speaker, this bill is on the Union Calendar, and I ask that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC ROADS ON CERTAIN INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9899) authorizing the laying out and opening of public roads on the Winnebago, Omaha, and Santee Sioux Indian Reservations in Nebraska.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the legal road authorities charged with the duty of laying out and opening public roads and highways under the laws of the State of Nebraska having jurisdiction over any territory embraced within the Winnebago Indian Reservation, the Omaha Indian Reservation, and the Santee Sioux Indian Reservation, in the State of Nebraska, are hereby authorized and empowered to lay out and open public roads within any of the said Indian reservations in conformity to and in accordance with the laws of the State of Nebraska relating to the laying out and opening of public roads, and that any public road when so laid out and opened shall be deemed a legal road.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand that when this bill was last considered there was violent objection to it from some Members of the House.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Yes; and I have an amendment to satisfy that objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform us what the amendment is?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I propose to offer an amendment to the second committee amendment, on page 2 of the bill, to strike out the period after the word "road," in line 11, insert a comma, and add the following:

And no such road shall be laid out until after it has received the approval of such superintendent.

Mr. STAFFORD. With that amendment, what additional rights or privileges do the counties have over what they have at the present time under the law?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. The counties have no rights at all on an Indian reservation at the present time. The roads on Indian reservations are practically by unanimous consent, roads laid out under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and the rules of the department are that practically unanimous consent must be obtained from all of the heirs before you can lay out a road, and it sometimes happens that a small piece of land will have a dozen heirs scattered all over the country, and it becomes almost impossible to secure a road.

As proof of this, here is a rich territory set down in the eastern portion of Nebraska, belonging to these Indians, highly valuable as agricultural lands, that has practically no roads established upon it because of the impracticable workings of the present law. This bill would simply put in the hands of the road authorities of the State of Nebraska the establishing of roads, and the law safeguards the rights of the citizens in that particular.

Mr. STAFFORD. And also safeguards the rights of the Indians by reserving to the superintendent his visé before the road can be opened?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Yes; and their rights will be amply safeguarded without that, as the law in that State does that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I question whether under the bill as it is, without amendment, they would be safeguarded.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, lines 7 and 8, after the word "reservation," insert the words "the Ponca Indian Reservation."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. I understand the gentleman's amendment to be an amendment to the next committee amendment?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, after the word "road," insert: "Provided, That such road authorities shall, in addition to notifying the landowners as provided in the State laws, likewise serve notice upon the superintendent in charge of the restricted Indian lands upon which it is proposed to lay out a public road, and shall also furnish him with a map drawn on tracing linen showing the definite location and width of such proposed road."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEPHENS] to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "road," at the end of the committee amendment, strike out the period, insert a comma, and insert "and no such road shall be laid out until after it has received the approval of such superintendent."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended to read: "A bill to authorize the laying out and opening of public roads on the Winnebago, Omaha, Ponca, and Santee Sioux Indian Reservations in Nebraska."

On motion of Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO HOMESTEAD SETTLERS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2316) authorizing leave of absence to homestead settlers upon unsurveyed lands.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any qualified person who has heretofore or shall hereafter in good faith make settlement upon and improve unsurveyed lands of the United States with intention, upon survey, of entering same under the homestead laws shall be entitled to a continuous leave of absence from the land settled upon by him for a period not exceeding five months in each year after establishment of residence: Provided, That he shall have plainly marked the exterior boundaries of the lands claimed and have filed in the local land office notice of the approximate location of the lands settled upon and claimed, of the period of intended absence, and that he shall upon the termination of the absence and his return to the land file notice thereof in the local land office.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "unsurveyed," insert the words "unreserved unappropriated public."

Lines 10 and 11, after the word "marked," insert the words "on the ground."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. STOUT. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman to reserve his objection for a moment.

Mr. MANN. Very well; I reserve the objection.

Mr. STOUT. There are thousands of people out in the public-land States of the West who go out there and settle on this unsurveyed land. They settle in sections where the land has not been surveyed. It is the only kind of land that they can settle on in that particular section. It is financially impossible for this Government to survey this land as fast as the people want to settle on it. Thousands and tens of thousands of acres of the very best land in my State is unsurveyed land. These people locate on it, and in many instances they have put in improvements running into thousands of dollars, expecting to and always do file on the land under the preference right given them by law.

All that this bill grants is simply these people shall have a leave of absence to leave their claims. Under the present statute if they leave them for only one night and somebody else goes and jumps it they are out all the work and improvements they put upon it. I certainly can not see any possible reason for objecting to the bill, and I think upon consideration the gentleman will not object.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will ask the gentleman if this bill does more for a settler who is upon unsurveyed land than the law grants a settler upon lands which are surveyed and under entry.

Mr. STOUT. It does just the same, exactly.

Mr. MANN. Let us see whether it does or not. A man goes on unsurveyed land for a homestead and he files an entry, does he not? A man goes on and squats on a piece of land and does not file anything. No; he does not file a thing.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman permit——

Mr. MANN. I am asking this gentleman a question; if he prefers to let the gentleman from Texas ask me one, I am perfectly willing. In the one case there can be no controversy about what the land is, because the man has filed on the surveyed land. On the other hand, there is no one knows what the land is, except he knows the boundary line—which may be changed overnight, by the way. Now, there is that difference, is there not?

Mr. STOUT. Yes; there is that difference.

Mr. MANN. Is all the surveyed land in Montana settled upon?

Mr. STOUT. Oh, no; no, sir.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know how rapidly they are surveying the lands now?

Mr. STOUT. Well, I will say to the gentleman, this is not a Montana bill; this is a general bill.

Mr. MANN. Well, I know; but I thought the gentleman might be glad for me to ask him a question about his own State. I did not believe he would know how much unsurveyed lands there were in Florida.

Mr. STOUT. Will the gentleman please ask his question again?

Mr. MANN. I asked the gentleman how much surveyed land there was in his own State, and how much there was not settled upon.

Mr. STOUT. I do not recall; but the Land Office records have that. But no doubt now there are great areas of land which have been surveyed but which have not been settled upon.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know how rapidly they are surveying the lands in his State?

Mr. STOUT. They spent last year $50,000 for the surveying of lands in Montana. I do not recall exactly the acreage, but it is quite large.

Mr. MANN. I am willing to do all I can to help the gentleman have his lands surveyed.

Mr. STOUT. Well, I really do not believe that the gentleman's objection to this bill is well taken. I can not see any reason why these people should not have the right to leave these claims for a while.

Mr. MANN. This would inevitably happen—it used to happen years ago. Here a man goes and squats on a piece of land. There is no record of it anywhere. He is required to put up under this bill some kind of a boundary line. If he goes away for five months and somebody else changes the boundary line, there is not only a row but probably bloodshed, and that would happen constantly, and I do not see any reason why we should encourage it.

Mr. STOUT. I will say, Mr. Speaker, we have hundreds—I suspect, thousands—of people squatting at the present time on unsurveyed lands——

Mr. MANN. Oh, but they stay on the land.

Mr. STOUT (continuing). In our State.

Mr. MANN. They stay on the land. These controversies will arise if you let them go away for half a year.

Mr. STOUT. I think the gentleman is assuming a case which is very far-fetched and not likely to happen at all. I know this will grant relief to vast numbers of people throughout the West.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

LEASING PRIVILEGES FOR HOTELS, YOSEMITE NATIONAL PARK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 1694) to amend an act approved October 1, 1890, entitled "An act to set apart certain tracts of land in the State of California as forest reservations."

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The bill is ordered stricken from the calendar.

GEORGE FREDERICK KUNZ.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 249) for the appointment of George Frederick Kunz as a member of the North American Indian Memorial Commission.

LEASING PRIVILEGES FOR HOTELS, YOSEMITE NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, on the other bill I did not rise at the time and we have gone on this bill. I know my friend from Illinois, if he would hear the report on this bill, would recognize the fact——

Mr. MADDEN. I have read the report and all connected with it, and I do not believe the Government of the United States ought to authorize any such lease as this bill provides or authorize anybody to make mortgages or to authorize the Department of the Interior to accept mortgages or to authorize such conditions as the bill provides for in any way, so I insist on my objection.

Mr. RAKER. Will not the gentleman withhold it for just a minute and give me a little opportunity?

Mr. MADDEN. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman explaining.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has an absolute right to object.

Mr. RAKER. I am just asking him if he will not withhold it.

Mr. MADDEN. I have no objection to withholding the objection for a moment to give the gentleman an opportunity.

Mr. RAKER. That is very kind of him. I appreciate it very much. In regard to this, Mr. Speaker, I want to be heard just a moment.

The SPEAKER. This is the bill that just preceded the last one?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; the one that is on the calendar as No. 1694. This bill is recommended by the conservation people.

Mr. MADDEN. Who are they?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Fisher, ex-Secretary of the Interior; Mr. Lane——

Mr. MADDEN. Does that make it any better?

Mr. RAKER. I am just giving a list of the men who approve such legislation.

Mr. MADDEN. I submit to the gentleman from California that we are elected here by the people to decide questions upon their merit and as to their advisability, and we are here exercising the right we have on the floor. It is not necessary at all for us to obey instructions from anybody on the outside as to what is right or what is not right.

Mr. RAKER. That is true. The gentleman has withheld his objection, and has been very kind to-day, as usual, and I just wanted to say a few words, thinking that the gentleman and the rest of the Members of the House might permit this bill to be considered to-day. It had, last year, the unanimous support of ex-Secretary Fisher and of all the department officials, and it has to-day the favorable report of the Secretary of the Interior, and in that report he makes this statement—I think it is worth while to call it to the attention of the House:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, June 10, 1913.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter has been received, submitting, with request for report thereon, House bill 1694, entitled "A bill to amend an act approved October 1, 1890, entitled 'An act to set apart certain tracts of land in the State of California as forest reservations.'"

In response I have to state that this bill is substantially the same as Senate bill 8279 (62d Cong., 2d sess.), which was reported upon favorably by this department under date of January 25, 1913 (copy herewith embodied in S. Rept. No. 1163), and which bill subsequently passed the Senate on January 29, 1913.

Now, listen, my brother from Illinois:

The enactment of this bill into law will be in the interest of better administration of affairs in the Yosemite National Park, and I therefore recommend the early and favorable consideration thereof by your committee.

Very truly, yours, FRANKLIN K. LANE.

Mr. MADDEN. I insist on my objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RAKER. How is that?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] insists on his objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. To do what?

Mr. RAKER. That I may extend my remarks in the RECORD upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks upon this bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will now report the bill which he first started to report.

GEORGE FREDERICK KUNZ.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 249) for the appointment of George Frederick Kunz as a member of the North American Indian Memorial Commission.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the vacancy in the commission for the erection of a memorial to the North American Indian caused by the death of Robert C. Ogden shall be filled by the appointment of George Frederick Kunz, of New York.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, having read the very complete report of the committee on this, would the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THACHER], now representing this great committee, give us some little information?

Mr. THACHER. I shall be glad to do so. I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will probably recall that the Sixty-second Congress authorized Mr. Rodman Wanamaker to erect at his own expense on a United States reservation in the harbor of New York a suitable memorial to the memory of the North American Indian, and the act of December 8, 1911, created a commission consisting of five persons, including the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the House, the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the Senate, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and Mr. Robert C. Ogden, of New York, to superintend the construction of this memorial, without expense whatever to the Government.

Mr. MANN. Who is George Frederick Kunz?

Mr. THACHER. Mr. George Frederick Kunz is a distinguished gentleman of New York. I believe he is well conversant with matters relating to art and in every way qualified to serve on the commission, and as Mr. Ogden died the place will naturally have to be filled. The memorial has not been erected yet, and there is a vacancy on this commission. In behalf of the Committee on the Library I ask permission of the House to have the vacancy filled.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the House joint resolution.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the educational bill (H. R. 9042) that was passed here a little earlier in the afternoon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SETTLERS ON FORT BERTHOLD AND OTHER INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 4632) for the relief of settlers on the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, in the State of North Dakota, and the Cheyenne River and Standing Rock Indian Reservations, in the States of South Dakota and North Dakota.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to extend for a period of one year the time for the payment of any annual installment due, or hereafter to become due, on the purchase price for lands sold under the act of Congress approved June 1, 1910, entitled "An act to authorize the survey and allotment of lands embraced within the limits of the Fort Berthold Reservation, in the State of North Dakota, and the sale and disposition of a portion of the surplus lands after allotment, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect," and any payment so extended may annually thereafter be extended for a period of one year in the same manner: Provided, That the last payment and all other payments must be made within a period not exceeding one year after the last payment becomes due by the terms of the act under which the entry was made: Provided further, That any and all payments must be made when due, unless the entryman applies for an extension and pays interest for one year, in advance, at 5 per cent per annum upon the amount due as herein provided, and patent shall be withheld until full and final payment of the purchase price is made in accordance with the provisions hereof: And provided further, That failure to make any payment that may be due, unless the same be extended, or to make any extended payment at or before the time to which such payment has been extended, as herein provided, shall forfeit the entry and the same shall be canceled, and any and all payments theretofore made shall be forfeited.

SEC. 2. That the provisions of the act of April 13, 1912, entitled "An act extending the time of payment to certain homesteaders on the Cheyenne River Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, and on the Standing Rock Indian Reservation, in the States of South Dakota and North Dakota," shall apply to all homestead entries for said lands heretofore or hereafter made in the same manner it applies, by its terms, to entries made before its passage.

With committee amendments as follows:

Page 1, line 4, strike out the words "and directed."

Page 2, line 4, after the word "effect," insert the following: "the act of Congress approved May 27, 1910, entitled 'An act to authorize the sale and disposition of the surplus and unallotted lands in Bennett County, in the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, and making appropriation to carry the same into effect,' and the act approved May 30, 1910, entitled 'An act to authorize the sale and disposition of a portion of the surplus and unallotted lands in Mellette and Washabaugh Counties, in the Rosebud Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect.'"

Page 3, line 14, strike out the word "said" after the word "for" and insert after the word "lands" the words "in said reservations."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, this bill, as I understand, is to permit settlers on the Fort Berthold and Standing Rock Indian Reservations to delay for a period of one year the time for paying annual installments on the purchasing price of lands in those reservations. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] if this includes a part of the reservation that was opened a year or two ago—a part of the Standing Rock Indian Reservation?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It does not include the part of the Standing Rock Indian Reservation that was authorized to be opened a year or two ago. In fact, that has not been opened yet to settlement.

Mr. FOSTER. It is the one that was to be opened under the act passed previous to that time?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOSTER. The report says that by failure of crops in the last two or three years these people have no money and can not pay, and that they will probably abandon their claims unless the Government gives them an extension for another year. Does the gentleman think that South Dakota is going in the next year to be able to overcome the drought and enable these people to pay the interest and principal?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman that if the same conditions obtain in the next few years that have obtained the last three years these lands will never be paid for at the price at which the settlers have entered them and have undertaken to pay. The lands were appraised at a time when conditions were favorable from the standpoint of more rainfall than we usually have in that section of the State, and at a time when there was a great demand for land, and the prices were fixed under the homestead law at as high as $6 an acre.

Now, settlers went in there and were required under the law to pay one-fifth of the purchase price at the time they made their entries. Following their settlement came a condition of drought that has continued for three years, and in this section of South Dakota there has been practically nothing raised, I will say to the gentleman, in the last three years.

What we are endeavoring to do by this bill is to make it possible, if such a thing is possible, that these people may save what they have already paid, and that they may be able to pay this price, which is more than can be obtained for the lands again if the settlers should abandon them—which they will do unless we accord them this relief.

Mr. FOSTER. What has become of the opening of the Standing Rock Indian Reservation? In the bill that was passed in the last Congress it was proposed to open for settlement the balance of the unallotted lands there and sell them off. Now, is the Government going ahead and taking action in reference to that remaining portion of the reservation?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Under that law there were a number of things that had to be done before the land was actually offered for sale and entry. Among other things were some allotments to the Indians. Then the State was given a certain time to make selections of lands in lieu of sections 16 and 36, which had been allotted. These preliminaries have not been concluded and the proclamation has not yet issued.

Mr. FOSTER. Are these lands that have been sold of the same character as the lands that are proposed to be sold?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Substantially the same, except that the lands that are proposed to be sold are not as desirable, I think, as these lands, because they are remnants left of a large area after the Indians have been allotted, and so much of it has been allotted that these tracts that are left are undesirable, and my opinion is that very little of it will be taken under the homestead law.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems to me I remember distinctly that in the last Congress the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] was very insistent on opening for settlement the remaining part of these unallotted lands. It seemed to me at that time that it ought not to be done; but in the course of legislation it was passed, and I suppose in due course of time the lands will be put up for sale and sold to some settlers; which probably would be a good thing, except now it develops that this country is so dry, on account of lack of rainfall, that they can not pay for these lands. So I wonder what is to be done with all the other lands when they are put up for sale.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. There is not very much land to be disposed of. I will say to the gentleman that I think about 150,000 to 200,000 acres in an area of about 1,300,000 acres are all that remain. Over 1,000,000 acres of that area have been allotted to the Indians, and the Indians have all received their allotments.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to say to the gentleman from South Dakota, on the statement he makes that these lands will probably go back to the Government, and that these people are really in distress——

Mr. MANN. The Government does not own these lands?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The Government does not own them. The Government is undertaking to dispose of these lands for the benefit of the Indians.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly. I understand.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. And instead of giving the money to the Indians, under the agreement of 1889, so far as these reservations in South Dakota are concerned, the money goes into the Treasury, and we appropriate it for the support and civilization of the Indians.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Thereby relieving the Treasury to that extent.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for just a moment?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we have had a lot of these cases at different times where we have required the payments to be made in the course of three, four, or five years, and then have extended the time. I think in nearly every one of those cases the land has finally been taken by the settlers, because the people go upon the land and go ahead and cultivate it. At first they do not succeed in getting very good crops. They get behind in the payments which they are required to make. Then we extend the time, and, while the extension is nominally for one year, it is extended again for another year if it is not paid until the last payment comes due.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Automatically.

Mr. MANN. And when the last payment comes due, if they have been able to do anything at all with the land and if things are not very adverse, they are able to borrow money upon their own credit and the credit of the land, enough to pay for it. That has been the history in all these cases since I have been in the House, and there have been a number of them.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, as I understand from my colleague, they buy these lands at, say, $6 an acre?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. They pay so much each year.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. One-fifth.

Mr. MANN. That is the requirement.

Mr. FOSTER. But, if we grant an extension of time, it goes over, and they get the use of these lands for 5 per cent upon the $6 an acre; and then, if at the end of the time they do not desire to pay for them, the land goes back to the Government.

Mr. MANN. The land goes back to the Indians.

Mr. FOSTER. For the benefit of the Indians.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And, I will say, to the gentleman also, if he will permit——

Mr. MANN. But, as a matter of fact, the settlers finally take them, if they have been at all successful, so that they are able to get the money to pay for them.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. When a new country has once been abandoned because settlers are unable to maintain themselves there, it is almost impossible to get another lot of people to go in under any conditions. Consequently, unless these settlers pay up, these lands will have to be disposed of at a very much smaller price than will be received if those now there pay the amount that they have agreed and are trying to pay.

Mr. MANN. Whether the lands are disposed of at a less price or not, settlers have to pay the same rate of interest, or a higher rate in some cases than would be paid if they paid the cash into the Treasury and the Government paid the interest. So the Indians do not lose anything by it.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand that.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. They get 2 per cent the best of it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Nearly all of them have put improvements on the land, and it will be a great hardship if they should lose out because of inability to make the payments.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of these extensions of time for settlers. I have asked for a good many of them for my own State, and Congress has granted them a number of times. But here you include in this instance some five or six Indian reservations and in two States. Is not that job-lotting them a little more than we have ever done before? Are these conditions in each case identical?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes; substantially the same, because they are all west of the Missouri River. Fort Berthold is in North Dakota, the portion of the Standing Rock Reservation affected by this bill is in South Dakota, and so are the other three reservations mentioned, namely, the Cheyenne River, Rosebud, and Pine Ridge.

Mr. FERRIS. On what terms were these lands sold? Surely not all on the same terms?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. In the Cheyenne River and Standing Rock Reservations the price was fixed by appraisement, the maximum being $6 an acre. In the Pine Ridge and Rosebud the bill fixed the price, and the maximum was $6 an acre for all land taken within a certain time, and then graduating it down to $2.50 an acre.

Mr. FERRIS. How many extensions have they had on the Fort Berthold Reservation?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will yield to the gentleman from North Dakota, who is more familiar with that reservation.

Mr. NORTON. The entries were first made on the Fort Berthold Reservation in May, 1912. Under the law providing for the opening of these lands to homestead settlement it was required that the time of making filing of homestead entry one-fifth of the purchase price should be paid and that the next installment should become due two years after the entry was made. There has heretofore been no extension of the time of payment granted to the homestead settlers on these lands. This is the first time they have asked for any extension of the time of installment payments.

Mr. Speaker, there is urgent need for the immediate enactment of this legislation. On the Fort Berthold Reservation a considerable number of the first annual installments to be paid became due on the 4th of this month. The remainder of the first installments to become due since the first entries were made on these lands will all become due within the next few weeks. Those directly interested in and affected by this proposed legislation had hope that this bill would have been enacted into law before the 1st of the present month. However, if this bill is allowed to be considered without objection this afternoon I shall, on behalf of my constituents who are interested in the bill, be very grateful to the Members of the House and freely concede that with the overcrowded condition the House Calendar is now and has been in for the past month, we are more than fortunate in getting consideration for this measure at this time. As the gentleman from Illinois has stated, the extension of the time of payment of these installments, as provided for in this bill, will work no injustice to the Government, but will be a very large benefit to the pioneer settlers on these lands and will enable many of them to continue on these lands who otherwise would be obliged to abandon their lands and the improvements already made thereon if required to make payment of the annual installment due this spring. The amount of the installment payments due this spring on lands on the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation is approximately $250,600. This is not by itself a large sum, but when it is remembered that the settlers on these lands have, on account of unusually dry weather in that section of the country, raised practically no crops the past three years, it is in the aggregate not only a large sum but an enormously large sum to require them to pay. Fifty or a hundred dollars is not a big sum to the man with hundreds or thousands of dollars in his pocket or at his command. On the other hand, a dollar is a mighty considerable sum to the honest, hardworking farmer, who, through failure of his crops, may not have a dollar in his pocket and who may not be able to secure a dollar without paying for its use an exorbitant rate of interest. These are things to be kept in mind in considering this legislation, gentlemen.

Mr. FERRIS. How many extensions have there been on the Cheyenne River?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. They have had none, so far as the entries that were made subsequent to the act that extended the time prior to the act of 1912. Those who made entry before that act was passed, their payments were extended, but this bill does not affect them. It only affects those who have filed since or who may file hereafter.

Mr. FERRIS. You first had an opening; what year was that?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The act was passed in 1908.

Mr. FERRIS. When were the lands sold?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think they went on the market the following year.

Mr. FERRIS. They have had how many, four extensions?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Only one.

Mr. FERRIS. How about the Standing Rock?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That is the same.

Mr. FERRIS. And the Rosebud?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Not any, so far as the lands affected by this bill are concerned.

Mr. FERRIS. And the Pine Ridge?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Not any.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman had an extension in the same omnibus bill that I had an extension in in 1912.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That is the one that extended the time of the settlers on the Cheyenne River and Standing Rock.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. In just a moment; I want to pursue this inquiry a little further. Now, on page 3, line 15, it seems to me that this provision is anomalous—to not only extend the time of the entries that have been made, but on those that may be made in the future. Does not the gentleman think that he is omnibussing a little too much when he provides for several reservations in two States for five or six tribes and then say that it shall not only apply to entries in the past but in the future?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The department suggested that.

Mr. MANN. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the department's letter. They requested that that be done.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The department found that the act passed in 1912 had worked so well that they favored making it general as to these reservations. It means the payment of interest in advance at 2 per cent more than the fund would receive credit for if extensions are not granted and the payments should be made and the money deposited in the Treasury.

Mr. FERRIS. You get 5 per cent for money in the bank?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Three in South Dakota and and 4 in North Dakota for money deposited in the Treasury.

Mr. FERRIS. They make them bid for it in my State.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. They do not bid in the Dakotas, as far as the tribal funds are concerned; they go into the Treasury, where, I think, they ought to go.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to inquire of the gentleman what has been the effect of deferred payments of settlement in his State. Here is a bill that authorizes the deferring of all the payments until the last, drawing interest thereon at 5 per cent.

Mr. FERRIS. We did not proceed in quite that way. We came in one year at a time. We had one year extension and then conditions were bad, crops failed, and we had to come back again. Settlers, as a rule, never pay until they have to.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. How many extension acts have there been affecting the Kiowas and Comanches?

Mr. FERRIS. I think three or four.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Was it not that condition that suggested the automatic extension in the act of 1912?

Mr. FERRIS. I think there was a small reservation in the district of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] that was applied in this way.

However, I wish the gentleman could inject something into this legislation that would keep off the scramble for free homes. It seems the longer you extend the payments, the worse they want the free homes, and the gentleman is afflicted with the same complaint in his State that we are in our State.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that in the Southwest—in the gentleman's country—and extending up to the Dakotas, it is very often the case that we will have two or three years of drought and then three or four years of good crops?

Mr. FERRIS. That is true.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Are we not now at about the end of two or three years of bad crops?

Mr. FERRIS. That is true. During the last three or four years in Oklahoma and in the gentleman's State drought has been very severe.

Mr. STAFFORD. This bill leaves it optional with the settler to extend the payments, whether there are droughts or not, provided he pays interest of 5 per cent in advance.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that the deferring of these payments does not take any money from the Indians, but leaves the payments in the Treasury for the benefit of the Indians?

Mr. FERRIS. That is true, and in the main they are making the land more valuable rather than wearing it out. Some time ago when I tried to get through a bill for an extension some one objected upon the ground that they were wearing the land out.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that the selling of these lands in this way will prevent a great many people from going to Canada and elsewhere?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; I have no doubt the matter of extending payments is a wise course. It is a tough proposition to try to hold down a claim for the first two or three or four years. The first three or four years they do not get anything off the land but a little fodder and stuff like that, which does not bring them in any money. The thought that made me rise to interrogate the gentleman is that there is such a lot of stuff omnibussed together, embodying two whole States and five or six reservations, all of which were sold under different acts of Congress.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is not the gentleman aware of the fact that these reservations are adjoining, and the same climatic conditions governing one will govern them all?

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, certainly. There is one thing more I desire to ask the gentleman from South Dakota. Does the gentleman from South Dakota really think that he ought to have the provision in providing for an extension even before the entry is made? Does the gentleman think we ought to make a law applicable to a man who has not even taken up any sort of relations with the Federal Government?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, unless you put it in we will be back here again with another bill. The department has suggested, to avoid confusion, that we ought to have uniformity.

Mr. FERRIS. I know, but it does not do the settler a great deal of harm to come back to Congress occasionally. You might put these payments off for so long a time that you would never get them.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It is put off only one year after the last payment is due.

Mr. FERRIS. I notice that, and that of course gets your money one year after it would have become due, so I guess it is not as bad as I at first thought.

Mr. FOSTER. I suggest that Congress has been pretty liberal about making these extensions when necessary, but I am not going to object.

Mr. MANN. These payments are due now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, strike out the words "and directed."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 4, after the word "effect," insert the following: "the act of Congress approved May 27, 1910, entitled 'An act to authorize the sale and disposition of the surplus and unallotted lands in Bennett County, in the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, and making appropriation to carry the same into effect,' and the act approved May 30, 1910, entitled 'An act to authorize the sale and disposition of a portion of the surplus and unallotted lands in Mellette and Washabaugh Counties, in the Rosebud Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect.'"

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 14, strike out the word "said" and insert, after the word "lands," the following: "in said reservations."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended to read: "An act for the relief of settlers on the Fort Berthold, Cheyenne River, Standing Rock, Rosebud, and Pine Ridge Indian Reservations, in the States of North and South Dakota."

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PAYMENT OF CERTAIN FIRE CLAIMS, ROSEBUD INDIAN RESERVATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 2156) to authorize the payment of certain claims for damages sustained by prairie fire on the Rosebud Indian Reservation, S. Dak.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have the gentleman from South Dakota——

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I think this is a claims bill and ought not to be here, and I object.

Mr. MANN. It is here properly enough.

Mr. FOSTER. I know it is here, but I do not think it has any right to be here.

Mr. MANN. I agree with the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

TENTS FOR AGRICULTURAL AND MECHANICAL COLLEGE, TEXAS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 232) authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer from stock on hand for use of the Army to the State of Texas for the use of the agricultural and mechanical college of said State 95 wall tents.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to transfer from stock on hand for the use of the Army to the State of Texas for the use of the agricultural and mechanical college of said State 95 wall tents to replace an equal number of wall tents supplied by said college for the use of the flood sufferers in the Brazos River bottom, State of Texas, in the year 1913, and which were afterwards condemned, such tents to be as nearly as practicable of the same quality and value as those supplied by said college, or in lieu thereof to supply from stock on hand for the use of the Army the equivalent in value in obsolete or shelter tents.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have the gentleman from Texas explain the reason why the Federal Government should furnish these tents lost when the Federal Government was there doing work for the benefit of the State of Texas at that time?

[Mr. HARDY addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I do not believe in doing business in that way. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] objects. The Clerk will report the next bill.

TERMS OF COURT AT ERIE, PA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 15190) to amend section 103 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, as amended by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1913.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer a formal amendment. There is a surplus word in the first line on page 3, the word "of," after the word "unless." I move to strike out the word "of."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 1, by striking out the word "of" after the word "unless."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AVIATION SERVICE OF THE ARMY.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, were it not for the fact that conditions exist of a very grave character, I would not at this time ask the House to take up this bill which I am now going to ask to be considered by unanimous consent. It is the House bill 5304, to increase the efficiency of the aviation service of the Army, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] asks unanimous consent to take up for present consideration House bill 5304, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. HAY. It is a long bill; and if anybody is going to object, I think it would be better for him to object now.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the bill ought to be reported, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not wish to object to the consideration of the bill, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. HAY. Very well. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the Clerk may report the bill as it is reported by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be, and there is hereby, created an Aviation Corps, which shall be a part of the line of the Army, and in which there shall be officers in number, and with rank while serving in said corps as follows, to wit—

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman that his motion to suspend the rules be to pass the House substitute, so that the original bill will not have to be read.

Mr. HAY. I ask that the bill as reported by the committee be read instead of the original bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill as reported by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

That there shall hereafter be, and there is hereby created, an aviation section, which shall be a part of the Signal Corps of the Army, and which shall be, and is hereby, charged with the duty of operating or supervising the operation of all military air craft, including balloons and aeroplanes, all appliances pertaining to said craft, and signaling apparatus of any kind when installed on said craft; also with the duty of training officers and enlisted men in matters pertaining to military aviation.

SEC. 2. That, in addition to such officers and enlisted men as shall be assigned from the Signal Corps at large to executive, administrative, scientific, or other duty in or for the aviation section, there shall be in said section aviation officers not to exceed 60 in number, and 260 aviation enlisted men of all grades; and said aviation officers and aviation enlisted men, all of whom shall be exclusively engaged on duties pertaining to said aviation section, shall be additional to the officers and enlisted men now allotted by law to the Signal Corps, the commissioned and enlisted strengths of which are hereby increased accordingly.

The aviation officers provided for in this section shall, except as hereinafter prescribed specifically to the contrary, be selected from among officers holding commissions in the line of the Army with rank below that of captain, and shall be detailed to serve as such aviation officers for periods of four years, unless sooner relieved, and the provisions of section 27 of the act of Congress approved February 2, 1901 (31 Stats., p. 755) are hereby extended so as to apply to said aviation officers and to the vacancies created in the line of the Army by the detail of said officers therefrom, but nothing in said act or in any other law now in force shall be held to prevent the detail or redetail at any time to fill a vancancy among the aviation officers authorized by this act, of any officer holding a commission in the line of the Army with rank below that of captain, and who, during prior service as an aviation officer in the aviation section, shall have become especially proficient in military aviation.

There shall also be constantly attached to the aviation section a sufficient number of aviation students to make, with the aviation officers actually detailed in said section under the provisions of this act, a total number of 60 aviation officers and aviation students constantly under assignment to, or detail in, said section. Said aviation students, all of whom shall be selected on the recommendation of the chief signal officer from among unmarried lieutenants of the line of the Army not over 30 years of age, shall remain attached to the aviation section for a sufficient time, but in no case to exceed one year, to determine their fitness or unfitness for detail as aviation officers in said section, and their detachment from their respective arms of service which under assignment to said section shall not be held to create in said arms vacancies that may be filled by promotions or original appointments: Provided, That no person, except in time of war, shall be assigned or detailed against his will to duty as an aviation student or an aviation officer: Provided further, That whenever, under such regulations as the Secretary of War shall prescribe and publish to the Army, an officer assigned or detailed to duty of any kind in or with the aviation section shall have been found to be inattentive to his duties, inefficient, or incapacitated from any cause whatever for the full and efficient discharge of all duties that might properly be imposed upon him if he should be continued on duty in or with said section, said officer shall be returned forthwith to the branch of the service in which he shall hold a commission.

SEC. 3. That the aviation officers hereinbefore provided for shall be rated in two classes, to wit, as junior military aviators and as military aviators. Within 60 days after this act shall take effect the Secretary of War may, upon the recommendation of the Chief Signal Officer, rate as junior military aviators any officers with rank below that of captain, who are now on aviation duty and who have, or shall have before the date of rating so authorized, shown by practical tests, including aerial flights, that they are especially well qualified for military aviation service; and after said rating shall have been made the rating of junior military aviator shall not be conferred upon any person except as hereinafter provided.

Each aviation student authorized by this act shall, while on duty that requires him to participate regularly and frequently in aerial flights, receive an increase of 25 per cent in the pay of his grade and length of service under his line commission. Each duly qualified junior military aviator shall, while so serving, have the rank, pay, and allowances of one grade higher than that held by him under his line commission, provided that his rank under said commission be not higher than that of first lieutenant, and, while on duty requiring him to participate regularly and frequently in aerial flights, he shall receive in addition an increase of 50 per cent in the pay of his grade and length of service under his line commission. The rating of military aviator shall not be hereafter conferred upon or held by any person except as hereinafter provided, and the number of officers with that rating shall at no time exceed 15. Each military aviator who shall hereafter have duly qualified as such under the provisions of this act shall, while so serving, have the rank, pay, and allowances of one grade higher than that held by him under his line commission, provided that his rank under said commission be not higher than that of first lieutenant, and, while on duty requiring him to participate regularly and frequently in aerial flights, he shall receive in addition an increase of 75 per cent of the pay of his grade and length of service under his line commission.

The aviation enlisted men hereinbefore provided for shall consist of 12 master signal electricians, 12 first-class sergeants, 24 sergeants, 78 corporals, 8 cooks, 82 first-class privates, and 44 privates. Not to exceed 40 of said enlisted men shall at any one time have the rating of aviation mechanician, which rating is hereby established, and said rating shall not be conferred upon any person except as hereinafter provided: Provided, That 12 enlisted men shall, in the discretion of the officer in command of the aviation section, be instructed in the art of flying, and no enlisted man shall be assigned to duty as an aerial flyer against his will except in time of war. Each aviation enlisted man, while on duty that requires him to participate regularly and frequently in aerial flights, or while holding the rating of aviation mechanician, shall receive an increase of 50 per cent in his pay: Provided further, That, except as hereinafter provided in the case of officers now on aviation duty, no person shall be detailed as an aviation officer, or rated as a junior military aviator, or as a military aviator, or as an aviation mechanician, until there shall have been issued to him a certificate to the effect that he is qualified for the detail or rating, or for both the detail and the rating, sought or proposed in his case, and no such certificate shall be issued to any person until an aviation examining board, which shall be composed of 3 officers of experience in the aviation service and 2 medical officers, shall have examined him, under general regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War and published to the Army by the War Department, and shall have reported him to be qualified for the detail or rating, or for both the detail and the rating, sought or proposed in his case: Provided further, That the Secretary of War shall cause appropriate certificates of qualification to be issued by The Adjutant General of the Army to all officers and enlisted men who shall have been found and reported by aviation examining boards in accordance with the terms of this act, to be qualified for the details and ratings for which said officers and enlisted men shall have been examined: Provided further, That except as hereinbefore provided in the cases of officers who are now on aviation duty and who shall be rated as junior military aviators as hereinbefore authorized, no person shall be detailed for service as an aviation officer in the aviation section until he shall have served creditably as an aviation student for a period to be fixed by the Secretary of War; and no person shall receive the rating of military aviator until he shall have served creditably for at least three years as an aviation officer with the rating of junior military aviator: Provided further, That there shall be paid to the widow of any officer or enlisted man who shall die as the result of an aviation accident, not the result of his own misconduct, or to any other person designated by him in writing, an amount equal to one year's pay at the rate to which such officer or enlisted man was entitled at the time of the accident resulting in his death, but any payment made in accordance with the terms of this proviso on account of the death of any officer or enlisted man shall be in lieu of and a bar to any payment under the acts of Congress approved May 11, 1908, and March 3, 1909 (35 Stat., pp. 108 and 755), on account of death of said officer or enlisted man.

SEC. 4. That all laws and parts of laws, so far as they are inconsistent with the terms of this act, be, and they are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 5. This act shall take effect 30 days after the date of its approval by the President.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the bill, on page 5, line 21, by striking out the word "is."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MANN. The word "is" is in the singular number, and it is all right.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my motion to amend.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia withdraws his amendment. Is there any other amendment?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out section 5 of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia moves to strike out section 5 of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Section 5 of the committee amendment, the gentleman means.

Mr. HAY. Yes; section 5 of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, lines 12 and 13, strike out section 5, as follows:
"This act shall take effect 30 days after the date of its approval by the President."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Now, Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested that I make a brief statement as to what this bill does. Under this bill there will be added to the Army 60 officers, who will have the rank of first and second lieutenants, and there will be added 260 men to the enlisted strength of the Army.

The bill will ultimately cost $279,994.50 a year.

Mr. MANN. And that will be the cheapest money we spend for the Army.

Mr. HAY. The bill has been very carefully drawn, and I believe it meets with the approval of the War Department. It is a bill for the purpose of establishing a military aviation corps, which will be under the Signal Corps of the Army. We are very much behind every other first-class power in the world in aviation. As an illustration of that I will point out that Germany has spent $28,000,000 on aviation. France has spent $22,000,000. Russia has spent $12,000,000. Italy has spent $8,000,000. Austria has spent $5,000,000, England $3,000,000, Belgium $2,000,000, Japan $1,500,000, and the United States only $435,000. So that we are very far behind other countries in the development of aviation, which is now so important, and which, I may say, has practically revolutionized modern warfare. For 1913 France appropriated $7,400,000, Germany $5,000,000, Russia $5,000,000, England $3,000,000, Japan $1,000,000, Italy $2,100,000, Mexico $400,000, and the United States $125,000.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman tell us how those appointments of officers in this corps are to be made?

Mr. HAY. The officers are to be detailed from the line by the President.

Mr. MADDEN. This does not add to the number of officers in the Army, then?

Mr. HAY. It does. It adds 60 officers.

Mr. MADDEN. How do we supply the shortage of the 60 who are taken from the line?

Mr. HAY. They will be filled like any other vacancies in the Army—either from the graduating class at West Point or by examination of civilians or by the examination of enlisted men.

Mr. AUSTIN. Is this a unanimous report of the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. HAY. Oh, yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice, apart from the main proposition, that you provide for payment to the widow in case of death. In many bills the House has provided that where the widow is not living the year's allowance shall be paid to the minor children.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I should like to ask whether the committee has considered paying this to the minor children in case there is no widow living?

Mr. HAY. This is taken from the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was not aware that that was the rule in the Army. Of course, there should be some provision made for paying to the minor children in case there is no widow living; but if this comports with the general rule in the Army, I do not wish to press an amendment at the present time.

Mr. HAY. This is taken from the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. I would suggest to the gentleman that we do not ordinarily put in what is contained in section 4, and I think it is wholly unnecessary.

Mr. HAY. That section provides:

That all laws and parts of laws, so far as they are inconsistent with the terms of this act, be, and they are hereby, repealed.

I do not now recall any particular law that is inconsistent with this act.

Mr. MANN. Of course, as a matter of fact, this act would repeal them, anyhow.

Mr. HAY. I move to strike out section 4.

Mr. MANN. It might be a little awkward to have it in there.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 12, strike out lines 9, 10, and 11.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing the report of the committee on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The report (by Mr. HAY) is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5304) to increase the efficiency of the aviation service of the Army, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do pass with the following amendment: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That there shall hereafter be, and there is hereby created, an aviation section, which shall be a part of the Signal Corps of the Army, and which shall be, and is hereby, charged with the duty of operating or supervising the operation of all military air craft, including balloons and aeroplanes, all appliances pertaining to said craft, and signaling apparatus of any kind when installed on said craft; also with the duty of training officers and enlisted men in matters pertaining to military aviation.

"SEC. 2. That, in addition to such officers and enlisted men as shall be assigned from the Signal Corps at large to executive, administrative, scientific, or other duty in or for the aviation section, there shall be in said section aviation officers not to exceed 60 in number, and 260 aviation enlisted men of all grades; and said aviation officers and aviation enlisted men, all of whom shall be exclusively engaged on duties pertaining to said aviation section, shall be additional to the officers and enlisted men now allotted by law to the Signal Corps, the commissioned and enlisted strengths of which are hereby increased accordingly.

"The aviation officers provided for in this section shall, except as hereinafter prescribed specifically to the contrary, be selected from among officers holding commissions in the line of the Army with rank below that of captain, and shall be detailed to serve as such aviation officers for periods of four years, unless sooner relieved, and the provisions of section 27 of the act of Congress approved February 2, 1901 (31 Stat., p. 755), are hereby extended so as to apply to said aviation officers and to the vacancies created in the line of the Army by the detail of said officers therefrom, but nothing in said act or in any other law now in force shall be held to prevent the detail or redetail at any time to fill a vacancy among the aviation officers authorized by this act, of any officer holding a commission in the line of the Army with rank below that of captain, and who, during prior service as an aviation officer in the aviation section, shall have become especially proficient in military aviation.

"There shall also be constantly attached to the aviation section a sufficient number of aviation students to make, with the aviation officers actually detailed in said section under the provisions of this act, a total number of 60 aviation officers and aviation students constantly under assignment to, or detail in, said section. Said aviation students, all of whom shall be selected on the recommendation of the Chief Signal Officer from among unmarried lieutenants of the line of the Army, not over 30 years of age, shall remain attached to the aviation section for a sufficient time, but in no case to exceed one year, to determine their fitness or unfitness for detail as aviation officers in said section, and their detachment from their respective arms of service which under assignment to said section shall not be held to create in said arms vacancies that may be filled by promotions or original appointments: Provided, That no person, except in time of war, shall be assigned or detailed against his will to duty as an aviation student or an aviation officer: Provided further, That whenever under such regulations as the Secretary of War shall prescribe and publish to the Army, an officer assigned or detailed to duty of any kind in or with the aviation section shall have been found to be inattentive to his duties, inefficient, or incapacitated from any cause whatever for the full and efficient discharge of all duties that might properly be imposed upon him if he should be continued on duty in or with said section, said officer shall be returned forthwith to the branch of the service in which he shall hold a commission.

"SEC. 3. That the aviation officers hereinbefore provided for shall be rated in two classes, to wit, as junior military aviators and as military aviators. Within 60 days after this act shall take effect the Secretary of War may, upon the recommendation of the Chief Signal Officer, rate as junior military aviators any officers with rank below that of captain, who are now on aviation duty and who have, or shall have before the date of rating so authorized, shown by practical tests, including aerial flights, that they are especially well qualified for military aviation service; and after said rating shall have been made the rating of junior military aviator shall not be conferred upon any person except as hereinafter provided.

"Each aviation student authorized by this act shall, while on duty that requires him to participate regularly and frequently in aerial flights, receive an increase of 25 per cent in the pay of his grade and length of service under his line commission. Each duly qualified junior military aviator shall, while so serving, have the rank, pay, and allowances of one grade higher than that held by him under his line commission, provided that his rank under said commission be not higher than that of first lieutenant, and, while on duty, requiring him to participate regularly and frequently in aerial flights, he shall receive in addition an increase of 50 per cent in the pay of his grade and length of service under his line commission. The rating of military aviator shall not be hereafter conferred upon or held by any person except as hereinafter provided, and the number of officers with that rating shall at no time exceed 15. Each military aviator who shall hereafter have duly qualified as such under the provisions of this act shall, while so serving, have the rank, pay, and allowances of one grade higher than that held by him under his line commission, provided that his rank under said commission be not higher than that of first lieutenant, and, while on duty requiring him to participate regularly and frequently in aerial flights, he shall receive in addition an increase of 75 per cent of the pay of his grade and length of service under his line commission.

"The aviation enlisted men hereinbefore provided for shall consist of 12 master signal electricians, 12 first-class sergeants, 24 sergeants, 78 corporals, 8 cooks, 82 first-class privates, and 44 privates. Not to exceed 40 of said enlisted men shall at any one time have the rating of aviation mechanician, which rating is hereby established, and said rating shall not be conferred upon any person except as hereinafter provided: Provided, That 12 enlisted men shall, in the discretion of the officer in command of the aviation section, be instructed in the art of flying, and no enlisted man shall be assigned to duty as an aerial flyer against his will except in time of war. Each aviation enlisted man, while on duty that requires him to participate regularly and frequently in aerial flights, or while holding the rating of aviation mechanician, shall receive an increase of 50 per cent in his pay: Provided further, That, except as hereinafter provided in the cases of officers now on aviation duty, no person shall be detailed as an aviation officer, or rated as a junior military aviator, or as a military aviator, or as an aviation mechanician until there shall have been issued to him a certificate to the effect that he is qualified for the detail or rating, or for both the detail and the rating, sought or proposed in his case, and no such certificate shall be issued to any person until an aviation examining board, which shall be composed of three officers of experience in the aviation service and two medical officers, shall have examined him, under general regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War and published to the Army by the War Department, and shall have reported him to be qualified for the detail or rating, or for both the detail and the rating, sought or proposed in his case: Provided further, That the Secretary of War shall cause appropriate certificates of qualification to be issued by The Adjutant General of the Army to all officers and enlisted men who shall have been found and reported by aviation examining boards in accordance with the terms of this act to be qualified for the details and ratings for which said officers and enlisted men shall have been examined: Provided further, That, except as hereinbefore provided in the cases of officers who are now on aviation duty and who shall be rated as junior military aviators as hereinbefore authorized, no person shall be detailed for service as an aviation officer in the aviation section until he shall have served creditably as an aviation student for a period to be fixed by the Secretary of War; and no person shall receive the rating of military aviator until he shall have served creditably for at least three years as an aviation officer with the rating of junior military aviator: Provided further, That there shall be paid to the widow of any officer or enlisted man who shall die as the result of an aviation accident not the result of his own misconduct, or to any other person designated by him in writing, an amount equal to one year's pay at the rate to which such officer or enlisted man was entitled at the time of the accident resulting in his death, but any payment made in accordance with the terms of this proviso on account of the death of any officer or enlisted man shall be in lieu of and a bar to any payment under the acts of Congress approved May 11, 1908, and March 3, 1909 (35 Stats., pp. 108 and 755), on account of death of said officer or enlisted man.

"SEC. 4. That all laws and parts of laws, so far as they are inconsistent with the terms of this act, be, and they are hereby, repealed.

"SEC. 5. This act shall take effect 30 days after the date of its approval by the President."

Amend the substitute offered by the committee as follows:

The subject of military aviation has engaged the attention of this committee and of the House of Representatives for the last three or four years. Last summer the bill H. R. 5304 was introduced, and the committee went into the subject very fully, having then had before it a large number of persons interested in the subject and obtaining from them views and opinions as well as statistics. The result of that investigation is this bill.

The War Department, some time ago, advised the passage of a bill which would have very largely increased the personnel of the Signal Corps. Your committee thought the plan embodied in this bill would be better and at the same time more economical. The committee has not sought to place an aviation service upon the same plane as that of the first-class war powers of Europe, but has tried to give to this service in this country a position which will enable it to keep abreast with the experiments which are being made in aviation, the committee feeling sure that the last word has not yet been said in that science and that it would be unwise and unnecessary for this country to expend the enormous sums which are being spent in other countries.

Your committee is thoroughly convinced that it would be most unwise to continue the parsimonious policy which the Government has pursued with regard to military aviation. It is expected that this committee will appropriate $300,000 in the pending Army bill as against $125,000 appropriated last year for the purchase and upkeep of aeroplanes, and it is thought that that amount, together with the personnel provided in this bill will enable our Army to make the experiments necessary to a thorough knowledge of the art, and to train the number of men who may be needed for service in time of emergency.

The cost of this bill will be as follows: First year, $258,002; second and third years, $269,044.50; fourth year, $279,994.50; which latter figures will show the highest sum which this bill will cost the Government at any time in the future. See itemized statement.

EXHIBIT A.

Annual estimated cost of the personnel of the aviation section of the Signal Corps under H. R. 5304:

In preparing the following estimate the object has been to find the approximate maximum, rather than minimum, cost, and it is thought that the totals given will be higher than what will actually occur when the bill goes into effect. For example, it is probable that a first lieutenant, junior aviator, may be on aviation duty but not actually flying. In this case he would receive the pay of captain, which would be less than his pay as a first lieutenant with 50 per cent added. All the master signal electricians are taken in their third enlistment period, and all other noncommissioned officers and enlisted men in their second enlistment period, and the 50 per cent increase allowed for aviation mechanicians has been applied to the highest, and not the lowest, grades.

There are at present 7 first and 14 second lieutenants on aviation duty, and it is fair to assume that the aviation branch will be composed of first and second lieutenants in the ratio of 1 to 2. This will make 20 first and 40 second lieutenants when the total number authorized has been detailed. The estimated cost is given for four years, as the total effect of the bill will not be felt until the fourth year. Inasmuch as the maximum limit of age for detail is 30 years, it is not possible that any officer on aviation duty can have more than two fogies. After the first year, judging from experience of the past, it is thought that of the 60 officers on duty 1 in 4 will be students, or 15 in all. Of these 15, 5 will be first lieutenants and 10 second lieutenants. There will be no military aviators until the fourth year. The assumed composition and cost of the aviation branch for the first year is as follows:

First year.

2 with 2 fogies	$7,200.00

These figures were given to the committee by the Chief of the Signal Corps. (See hearing on bill 5304, p. 267.)

It is hardly necessary in a report of this character to dwell upon the importance of military aviation, nor to point out its importance in modern warfare. That military aviation is destined to play an important and conspicuous part in future wars is certain; and that this country would make a grave mistake if it wholly neglected this branch of the military service is equally certain.

Mr. HAY. If no Member desires to ask any further questions, I will ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I thought we would run until 6 o'clock on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, if any gentleman has any bill that he wants to take up. If not, I will move that the House adjourn.

Mr. MANN. The bills are all put away, anyway.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Tuesday, May 19, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 19, 1914.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we seek from Thee the spiritual equipment for life's great service. Unless Thy spirit go up with us, send us not up hence. For who is sufficient for these things? When we measure the length and breadth of human responsibility, we would despair if only intellectual power could be applied to the tasks that press upon us. We would be altogether unfit if we possessed only material wealth in a world like this. For out of the heart are the issues of life. We pray that Thy grace may come upon our hearts, fitting us in every thought and purpose and desire to do Thy will. Through the consecration of our lives by Thy grace may we accomplish much for the peace of the world and for the happiness of mankind. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

COAL LANDS IN ALASKA.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I send to the desk a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, with accompanying papers, which I ask may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, May 15, 1914.

To the Members of Congress:

What am I to say to this man? If the Alaskan coal-leasing bill becomes law this session the answer will be easy.

FRANKLIN K. LANE.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 28, 1914.

Hon. FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am shipping a dredge into Alaska to work a placer-mining claim owned by me on Cache Creek, in the Yetna mining district in southwestern Alaska. In the vicinity of my mining claim there are several veins or outcroppings of coal. I would like to get permission from the Government to extract a sufficient amount of this coal to burn in the operation of the dredge for mining purposes. These veins or outcroppings of coal are along the Short Creek, a tributary to Cache Creek, and this coal is suitable for use for mining purposes but is not a marketable coal.

It is not my purpose to extract any of this coal for any commercial purposes or for sale, but simply for the purpose of burning in the operation of my dredger.

There is also some coal of the same character on the Yetna River, and I would like permission to extract sufficient amount of this coal to burn in the stern-wheel river boat for transportation of my dredger to MacDougal Station, near my mining property.

I do not want to violate any of the rules and regulations of the Interior Department, or any law in relation to the extraction of coal from coal lands in Alaska, and for this reason I would like to have a permit to use the coal mentioned for the purpose stated.

If it is necessary to fill out any blanks or forms used by the Government I would be pleased to have you forward these blanks to me at Susitna Station, Alaska.

Yours, truly,

J. C. MURRAY.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, May 15, 1914.

RELATIVE TO COAL LANDS IN ALASKA.

Mr. J. C. MURRAY,
Claus Spreckels Building, San Francisco, Cal.

MY DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of April 28, 1914, you are advised that on November 12, 1906, by order of the department all public lands in the District of Alaska in which workable coal was known to occur were withdrawn from entry, filing, or selection under the coal-land law. The circular of May 16, 1907, permitted parties who had initiated valid coal claims prior to withdrawal to complete their entries and acquire title to the lands covered thereby. By Executive order of July 2, 1910, the withdrawal of November 12, 1906, was ratified, confirmed, and continued in full force and effect, and the public lands and lands in national forests in the District of Alaska in which workable coal is known to occur were withdrawn from location, settlement, sale, or entry and reserved for classification and in aid of legislation providing for the disposal of coal lands. This withdrawal is still in force, and there has been as yet no law passed by Congress providing for the disposal of the coal deposits in these withdrawn lands. There is accordingly no authority of law for the granting of permits to parties to mine coal on the public lands in Alaska for use in the operation of a dredger or for any purpose.

There is now pending before Congress certain legislation which provides for a system of leasing the public coal lands in Alaska, and until Congress provides some method by which the public coal lands in that district may be opened up and developed this office can grant you no relief.

Very respectfully, CLAY TALLMAN, Commissioner.

Mr. WALSH. In the same connection I send to the desk a brief editorial from the Washington Times of May 16, and ask that it be read.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was read, as follows:

PASS THESE MEASURES

There may be some excellent reasons for hurrying the adjournment of Congress, but none of them is good enough to justify ending the session before the conservation measures now reported from the House Public Lands Committee shall have passed. With all deference to pet features of the administration program, the opinion is ventured that more people are concerned in behalf of these conservation bills than in behalf of trades commission and antitrust acts.

For a decade or thereabouts these problems of dealing with the public lands, both in the States and in Alaska, have been before Congress and the country. They have been considered from every angle. There is no need for longer delay. Secretary Lane has given his approval to a series of measures for control of water powers, Alaskan lands, and other details of public-land administration. There is every reason for confidence that the measures are safe and desirable. They have been reported from the House committee. The Western States and the great northwestern territory need to have their opportunity of progress and development restored to them, and these measures will do very much toward restoring it.

President Wilson has indicated that he would be glad to see these bills become laws at the current session, but it is not understood that he includes them in the program on which he insists. Probably they will not be passed unless they are brought within the irreducible minimum of Executive demands. There is enough and violent opposition to prevent their passage unless the whole power of the administration is placed behind them. Every consideration of the real public interest of the great West demands that this be done.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Whereas the President of the United States, after watchful waiting for the past several months over the condition of affairs in Mexico in looking after the interest of our citizens in that country and, if possible, to avoid any severe clash with our neighbors on our southern border, and living in hope the trouble existing in Mexico would be adjusted by her people in such a manner as would be satisfactory to both the people of Mexico and the United States:

Resolved, That we, the members of the Americus Association, of Elizabeth, N. J., here assembled in the celebration of the fortieth anniversary of our association, pledge ourselves to support the President of the United States in the stand he takes on the Mexican question and that we hold ourselves ready to supply and fill any position the governor of New Jersey sees fit to call us in upholding the respect of our country and the honor of our flag.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. BRADY submitted an amendment authorizing the accounting officers of the Treasury to credit the account of William Schuldt, of Lewiston, Idaho, late deputy United States marshal, with the sum of $101 expended by him in traveling on official business, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRYAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JAMES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

SURVEY OF FLORIDA WATERS.

Mr. BRYAN. For my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] I submit a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 365) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, directed to furnish the Senate with all of the data and information available touching the improvement of the navigable waterway from the navigable waters of the Caloosahatchee River to the navigable waters of Lake Okechobee, Fla., heretofore procured under the act of Congress approved June 25, 1910, providing for a survey of the Kissimmee and Caloosahatchee Rivers and Lake Okechobee and its tributaries, with a view to adopting a plan of improvement of said waters which will harmonize as nearly as may be practicable with the general scheme of the State of Florida for the drainage of the Everglades.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BURTON. I should like to understand the resolution. Does it provide for the appropriation of a certain amount of money?

Mr. BRYAN. It is simply a resolution calling upon the Secretary of War for certain information.

Mr. BURTON. Is it a Senate resolution or a joint resolution?

Mr. BRYAN. It is a Senate resolution, calling upon the Secretary of War for information.

Mr. BURTON. I will state that some years ago the question was several times raised whether under the law the War Department was authorized to submit a report merely on a Senate resolution, and the decision was in the negative. That was along about the year 1903 or 1904. To whom is this resolution addressed?

Mr. BRYAN. It is addressed to the Secretary of War.

Mr. BURTON. I suppose when it reaches the Secretary of War he will consider the question. There are very valid objections to allowing a report to be made merely on a resolution of either House. It involves a certain degree of partiality. I shall not, however, object. Let the question be tried out hereafter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

TRUSTS AND THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. SMOOT. I have a copy of a monograph by Hugo Clark and Bartlett Brooks on the trusts and the Constitution. I present it by request, and I ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Printing with the view to having it printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

TRANSPORTATION OF PARCEL-POST MATTER.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 363, by Mr. SMITH of Georgia, requesting the Joint Committee on Postage on Second-Class Mail Matter and Compensation of Transportation of Mails to report.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire that the resolution may go over for two or three days. I ask that it may be permitted to go over, without prejudice, until Saturday next. I hope we may have some information by that time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution goes over without prejudice, to be handed down at the end of morning business on Saturday next.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, there have been very many criticisms of the President of the United States in his course in the Mexican trouble; some by Huerta because the President was going too rapidly and some by Americans because he was not going rapidly enough. I desire to read and to put into the RECORD a letter which I received this morning from a personal acquaintance, of whose character and responsibility I have full knowledge, and upon whose judgment I have a great deal of reliance. It is a very short letter, and I shall take the liberty of reading it. I purposely shall not put the name of the writer into the RECORD, because he is in the service and it might be thought improper for him to be writing letters upon a political question. He says:

> If you were down here and in close touch with the whole thing you could easily see why the efforts of the President to compose the trouble is so roundly condemned. The noisiest thing in Mexico is an American dollar that feels itself in jeopardy. I met one of these blatant so-called refugees last night and had a talk with him. He was for marching on the city at once. I pressed him down, found he had not paid a cent of taxes in the United States for 15 years, had not voted in the States in 15 years, did not intend to return to the United States, but did cuss out all of you gentlemen who are opposed to what will certainly be a war of conquest, that ought never to be started to appease dollar-grabbing fortune hunters, who, having taken a gambler's chance and the game having gone against them, want Uncle Sam to step in and pull their chestnuts out of the fire.
> The assimilation of these people will be impossible, and to take up the task of governing them will be another Philippine elephant of larger proportions and more difficult to handle. Wee Willie Hearst has a large corps of men here making mountains out of molehills for the purpose of inflaming the public mind, in order that his investments in lands in Mexico may be enhanced in value. It is a rotten game, and the majority of the newspaper men here do not want to see war. The suffering it would entail on these people to march on their capital would be enormous, and the picture Gambetta drew of the beggar at a barracks door will be realized if we do not stop this great drain on our resources to take care of the military.
> We can not take Mexico without the loss of more than 200,000 men, and it will require around $10,000,000,000 to subjugate the people. I do hope that you and the other thoughtful leaders of the Senate will pause before plunging this country in a war of conquest to save gamblers' dollars.
> Every officer that I have met and all the enlisted men are opposed to war. There are fewer jingoes in the Army and Navy than any place I know of. Now, this does not mean a lack of patriotism and a desire that respect be shown the flag, but it does mean an appreciation of what war means.
> It would be cheaper to take every refugee out of here, pay him every dollar due him, pension him for life, and let his blatant mouth be heard at home, as insufferable as that would be, rather than engage in war.

The remainder of the letter is personal.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Mississippi if the name of the gentleman who wrote that letter is to be inserted in the RECORD?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Mississippi announced at the very beginning that he would not give his name, because he is engaged in the service, and it might be thought improper for him to be writing letters upon political subjects.

Mr. BORAH. I think myself that it is very improper for him to write that kind of a letter without his name being given.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Mississippi also announced that he was a personal acquaintance of his and a man of the highest character and good judgment.

Mr. BORAH. That is sufficient; but I disagree with his reflection upon all citizens of the United States who may be in Mexico.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And it has been put in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

Mr. GALLINGER. In this connection, Mr. President, I will say that I have a letter on my table, received two days ago, from a gentleman who has not been an exploiter in Mexico, but who has been in charge of an industry in which the people of New Hampshire have invested $400,000, and he writes a very different kind of a letter from the one the Senator from Mississippi has read. I have hesitated to put it in the RECORD, but I am not quite sure that I will not do so. It is not a criticism of the President, I will say.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the Senator will put it in, and I hope that all letters from people with personal financial interests will go in the RECORD, to show the true character of the opposition to the President's policy.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator knew the gentleman to whom I refer, he would not cast any slur upon him——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have cast none.

Mr. GALLINGER. Because he has been engaged in legitimate business in Mexico and he ought to have been protected to a greater extent than he has been. He makes no criticism upon the President or the State Department, but simply details facts concerning the condition of things in a portion of that territory where the men who are in command seem to be in high——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will remember that what I have said and what I have read refers only to those who have made criticisms upon the President; so that if his correspondent makes none, there is no reference to him.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course the Senator's correspondent did not name anyone who had made criticisms. However, at the suggestion of the Senator, I think to-morrow or the next day I shall ask that the letter from my correspondent may be read and go into the RECORD.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate for consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on a former occasion I somewhat briefly discussed the bill now before the Senate, which proposes the repeal of the toll-exemption provision of the Panama Canal act. Since that time the matter has been freely discussed in the public press, and many elaborate arguments have been made, on both sides of the question, in this body. I now propose to further analyze the subject, with a view of elucidating the contention of some of us that repeal is unnecessary, impolitic, and not demanded by any just interpretation of existing treaties.

WHO IS URGING THE REPEAL?

In entering upon a discussion of this question it is proper to inquire how our attention was first directed to the supposed necessity for the repeal of the exemption clause of the Panama Canal act; from what quarter the appeal emanated; and the reasons advanced which should cause us to retreat from the position taken at the time of the passage of the act.

It seems that on July 8, 1912, Mr. A. Mitchell Innes, chargé d'affaires of Great Britain, addressed a note to our Secretary of State calling attention to the various proposals then being made to relieve American shipping from the burden of Panama Canal tolls, and stating that such exemption would be considered by Great Britain as contrary to the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Mr. Innes gave as the opinion of His Majesty's Government that there is no "difference in principle between charging tolls only to refund them and remitting tolls altogether," but in referring to the possibility of the remission of tolls being accorded only to our vessels engaged in the coastwise trade Mr. Innes says:

> If the trade could be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic which is reserved for United States vessels would be benefited by this exemption it may be that no objection could be made.

It is proper to add that after making the above suggestion Mr. Innes said that, in his judgment, it would be impossible to frame regulations which would prevent the exemption from resulting in fact in a preference to United States shipping, and consequently in an infraction of the treaty, but it occurs to me that that objection can easily be overcome by a slight amendment to the Panama Canal act, if indeed any amendment is necessary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me a moment, I should like to ask him a question for information as to his view upon it. The language the Senator has just read says "bona fide coastwise trade." Does the Senator think or does he not think that any coastwise trade could be bona fide where the ships engaged in it have to touch at two foreign ports, in this particular case Colon and Panama?

Mr. GALLINGER. Why, Mr. President, I assume that the coastwise ships would not of necessity have to touch at those ports for commercial purposes, and the passing of those ports on their way through the canal would not take from them their bona fide coastwise character.

After the receipt of the note from Mr. Innes the Panama Canal act, which contains the objectionable exemption, was passed on August 24, 1912. The secretary of state for foreign affairs of Great Britain, Sir Edward Grey, then forwarded a detailed statement to this Government amplifying the former note of Mr. Innes and taking exception to the memorandum of President Taft, which accompanied the approval of the act.

From that time until January 21, 1913, little was heard of the matter, and most of those who gave the subject any thought presumed that inasmuch as the exemption was to be confined to the coastwise traffic of the United States no further objection would be made by Great Britain. On the last-mentioned date, however, the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] delivered a very exhaustive speech in the Senate, in which he reaffirmed and emphasized the previous contention of Great Britain, arguing that under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we had no right to grant toll exemption to our coastwise or other shipping, and contending that the whole matter should be submitted to arbitration. This speech was seized upon by the Carnegie Peace Foundation, and by the expenditure of many thousands of dollars hundreds of thousands of copies of the speech were distributed broadcast over this country and England. This unexpected turn of affairs gave fresh impetus to the British contention, with the result that on February 27, 1913, the British ambassador called attention to the subject again in a note to the Secretary of State. The matter was overshadowed by the tariff and currency legislation during the special session of Congress last summer, but at the beginning of the present year it was again brought forward and bills introduced having in view the repeal of the exemption clause of the act.

On March 5, 1914, President Wilson delivered an address to the Senate and House on the subject, which without doubt is the most remarkable presidential utterance that has ever been presented to Congress. One searches the message in vain for a single valid reason to warrant us in consenting to the repeal which the President advocated. Instead we were told that "We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong," and that, using the President's words, "I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure." The message is full of mystery and absolutely lacking in any statement upon which, maintaining our self-respect, we could predicate a reversal of an action affecting the welfare of this country.

It will thus be seen that the sources from which nearly all of this agitation springs are Great Britain and the President of the United States. No other nations have voiced a protest to the exemption of our coastwise ships from tolls, although it would be supposed that all nations would have an interest in the matter directly proportional to the amount of their shipping using the canal. The American people as a whole have certainly made no demand for this repeal, and beyond those who have blindly followed the President in his appeal to redeem what he chooses to call "the words of our own promises" the rallying cry is heard to save for Americans that which was built with American money, on American territory, and by American brains.

WHY ENGLAND FAVORS REPEAL.

In addition to the direct benefit to British and other foreign shipping which would result from the repeal of the exemption provision, I desire to call attention to another economical advantage which will accrue to English manufacturers. The Pacific coast producers of oil, wheat, flour, lumber, fruit, etc., are planning to make shipments direct to England and the Continent by way of the Panama Canal. In returning these ships will bring to the Pacific coast the products of the cheap labor of the factories of England, Germany, and other countries, which will be sold to the people of the western coast. If the exemption provision is repealed the English shipper will be able to add over a dollar per ton to the price of his shipments and still compete with the goods shipped from our Atlantic coast via the canal to the Pacific coast which would have to pay a toll of $1.20 per ton. Of course, this means an enormous profit to the English producer, and he adds his demand for repeal to that of the British shipowner.

NO PROTESTS FROM OTHER NATIONS.

We are constantly assailed with the statement that all the nations of the world are siding with Great Britain as against the United States in this matter, but when pressed for some specific instance where a foreign nation other than Great Britain has entered a protest the proponents of repeal are silent.

The President in his recent message said:

Whatever may be our own differences of opinion concerning this much-debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal.

The President offers no proof of this statement or of any other statement in his remarkable address, and Congress and the public are expected to swallow it without a murmur.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GALLINGER. I should prefer to continue, Mr. President, but I am always accommodating.

Mr. REED. I wish to ask the Senator just one question. Did he ever in his life know of a case where, to illustrate, a farmer owned a piece of ground, and the public were claiming the right to pass over it, where all the public would not be for their own interest and against the farmer's interest? And is not that pretty nearly a parallel with the present situation, when all the nations of the earth are said to be on one side and our Nation on the other?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, doubtless that is so; and yet, even admitting that to be so, we have no proof whatever, and no proof has been submitted from any quarter, that any other nation has taken exception to the Panama Canal act so far as the exemption provision is concerned. We are left absolutely and totally in the dark as to what position those nations may take regarding it.

Mr. REED. What I meant by my illustration was that whether they had taken the position or not it would be very natural for them to take it, as their own interest would lie there; and it does not appeal to me as a very strong argument even if they do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I agree with the Senator on that point, and it is more remarkable, if they feel as Great Britain does, that they have not joined in the protest of Great Britain submitted to our State Department.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] in his comprehensive speech a short time ago said:

The opinion of foreign nations, with hardly an exception, and that only in the case of some individuals, is against the interpretation which I believe to be correct.

What specific, authoritative proof is there that "the opinion of foreign nations" is against our interpretation of the treaty? What foreign Governments have objected? The Senate is not in possession of any correspondence, if there be such, which would indicate such a contention. So far as any present official information goes the only objection to the exemption of American coastwise ships has come from Great Britain.

The foremost German authority on shipping matters, Count von Reventlow, after a discussion of the tolls question, summarizes his views as follows:

It has been years, if, indeed, such a case ever occurred before, since the United States so openly backed down before England—years since it so openly felt and said it no longer was absolute in its own sphere, but dependent upon other powers.

Again, the Law Magazine and Review of London, in a very lengthy discussion of the subject, recognizes the right of the United States to discriminate in favor of its own vessels passing through the Panama Canal, as follows:

To sum up, it is reasonably arguable:

(a) That the United States can support its action on the precise words of the material articles of the treaty, that its case is strengthened by reference to the preamble and context, and that its case is difficult to challenge on ground of general justice;

(b) That there is no international obligation to submit the construction of its legislative act to any process of arbitration; and

(c) That any aggrieved party has an appropriate and impartial and a competent tribunal in the Supreme Court of the United States.

The full article will be found in the London Law Review for November, 1912, volume 38, pages 1 to 34.

Other citations might be mentioned which make it appear that the leading authorities in the legal profession, as well as experts on the subject of shipping, not only in England but in other countries, admit that our position is based on equity and logic. Undoubtedly many foreign newspapers, not only in Great Britain but on the Continent, are hostile to the exemption of American coastwise ships at Panama. But these same newspapers and the influences behind them—the great European steamship syndicates and combinations—were much more violently and persistently hostile to the ocean mail bills for American lines to South America and the Orient. These foreign interests do not relish the idea of any American interference with their monopoly of ocean navigation. They have very good reason to dread the result of national encouragement of any kind to American shipbuilding and shipowning, and they know it. If the Senator from Massachusetts waits for some effective legislation in favor of American shipping which the European press and the European steamship combinations will not criticize and object to, he will wait indefinitely.

NO PROTEST MADE WHEN EXEMPTION OF TOLLS WAS GRANTED TO THE REPUBLICS OF PANAMA AND COLOMBIA.

In the Hay-Herran treaty with Colombia, ratified by the Senate on May 17, 1908, the following words are found:

The Government of Colombia shall have the right to transport over the canal its vessels, troops, and munitions of war at all times without paying charges of any kind.

After the ratification of that treaty the Republic of Panama came into existence, and the Hay-Bunau-Varilla treaty with that country was ratified by the Senate on February 23, 1904. It contains the following words:

The Government of the Republic of Panama shall have the right to transport over the canal its vessels and its troops and munitions of war in such vessels at all times, without paying charges of any kind.

It is also a fact that the treaty recently negotiated by the Secretary of State with Colombia contains a provision similar to those I have just quoted, and we are thus treated to the remarkable spectacle of the administration, presumably the guardian of the rights of the American people, granting exemption of tolls through the Panama Canal to a foreign country and in the same voice demanding that the United States, the builder and owner of the canal, shall be denied that privilege.

I have not heard of any protests having been lodged with this country because of the provisions in these treaties with Panama and Colombia. Can it be possible that we can discriminate in favor of the shipping of those countries and at the same time be prevented from making a similar concession to our own commerce?

The Senator from Massachusetts answers this argument as follows.

This grant, whether limited or not, was part of the compensation for the title obtained by the United States, without which the canal could not have been built, and does not therefore sustain the arguments in support of the exemption of the merchant vessels of the United States from tolls, because unless we had secured our title and building rights from Panama there would have been no canal. No nation could and no nation did object to the consideration paid to Panama for our rights and title on the Canal Zone.

The reply to this would seem to be that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was in effect at the time of the ratification of the treaties with Colombia and Panama, and therefore such a consideration was not in our power to give. Suppose at some future time we became financially indebted to another country; according to this argument we could give as part consideration the right to use the Panama Canal free of tolls. So we have this preposterous situation: Under the "all nations" clause of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we grant, without protest from Great Britain, exemption of tolls to the ships of certain foreign countries, but are prevented from giving the same concession to the vessels of our own country.

The Senator from Massachusetts quotes article 19 of the Panama treaty, relating to the exemption of tolls to that Republic, which I read a moment ago, and then says:

* * * article 19 applies apparently only to the vessels of the Republic—that is, naval vessels and those carrying troops and munitions of war.

The Senator argues from this that, as nobody claims that we have no right to pass our Government-owned vessels through the canal free, the treaty with Panama can not be used as an argument in support of exempting tolls for our merchant ships. In this connection it is interesting to note that on June 19, 1902, six months after the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the same Senate, by a vote of 67 to 6, passed the bill providing for the building of the Panama Canal, afterwards signed by the President on June 28, 1902. The Senator from Massachusetts voted in favor of the bill, section 6 of which reads as follows:

SEC. 6. That in any agreement with the Republic of Colombia or with the States of Nicaragua and Costa Rica the President is authorized to guarantee to said Republic or to said States the use of said canal and harbors, upon such terms as may be agreed upon, for all vessels owned by said States or by citizens thereof.

Suppose the treaty with Panama should be construed as extending the exemption of tolls to privately owned vessels of that Republic, would the Senator then claim that it was in violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, after his approval of the legislation I have just read, in which it is expressly agreed that the President may extend that privilege to private owners of vessels?

ENGLAND AND THE SUEZ CANAL.

The clause covering tolls, equality of treatment, and so forth, in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was borrowed verbatim from the convention of Constantinople governing the Suez Canal, the chief stockholder in which is the British Government. It is interesting, therefore, in connection with the demands of Great Britain for equality of tolls through the Panama Canal for all nations, including the United States, to observe how this matter of "equality" is interpreted in the management of the Suez Canal. Some foreign nations pay outright the tolls of their own ships through the Suez Canal without protest from the British Government or anybody else. Yet Mr. Innes, in his note of July 8, 1912, says:

But there is a great distinction between a general subsidy, either to shipping at large or to shipping engaged in any given trade, and a subsidy calculated particularly with reference to the amount of user of the canal by the subsidized lines or vessels. If such a subsidy were granted, it would not, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, be in accordance with the obligations of the treaty.

It is difficult to comprehend why England should object to this Government rebating the tolls to American shipping through the Panama Canal, or, which is the same thing, remitting the tolls altogether, and at the same time permit other Governments to refund specifically the tolls of their vessels through the Suez Canal, both canals being governed by the same rules of equality.

Great Britain herself pays to her principal steamship lines through the Suez Canal a subsidy equivalent to at least two-thirds of the tolls on her ships. The facts as to Suez Canal tolls and their repayment by foreign Governments are set forth on pages 15–17 of the Report of the Commissioner of Navigation for 1911.

In view of what foreign Governments are doing at Suez, it is easy to imagine what will speedily happen to American ships at Panama. They will be the only ones that will actually be required to pay tolls there. This is what the President is proposing. Already the British Government has increased by $340,000 annually the subsidy to the Royal Mail Steam Packet Co., the principal line of British steamers that will pass through the Panama Canal. Of course this was not given definitely for the tolls, but it will repay the tolls and more. It is nominally contingent on a slight, inexpensive improvement in the mail service to the West Indies. Doubtless in anticipation of the opening of the canal, the Canadian Government has just given another subsidy of $340,000 to this same Royal Mail Steam Packet Co. for a line from Halifax to the British West Indies—a compensation far in excess of the American rates under the ocean mail law. Presumably this line also, with its subsidy to pay the tolls, will be in a position to continue through the canal from Halifax to Vancouver.

Mr. President, in some remarks I made a short time ago in the Senate (April 25) I set forth in detail the preparations that are being made by foreign Governments to remit the tolls on their vessels through the Panama Canal. As the canal nears completion practically all countries are taking steps toward this end, and I beg leave to submit in this connection two additional items relating to subsidies, a part or a whole of which will undoubtedly be used to pay the tolls through the Panama Canal on foreign steamships.

STEAMSHIP SUBSIDIES OF CANADA.

Important facts regarding the subsidized steamship services of the Dominion of Canada are set forth in part 6 of the report of the department of trade and commerce of Canada for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1913, printed at Ottawa in 1914.

The total expenditures for the year 1912–13 by the Canadian Government for the encouragement of steamship services were $2,703,200.

The principal subsidized steamship lines were as follows:

Canada & Great Britain	$1,000,000
Canada & Cuba	25,000
Canada & Newfoundland	70,000
Canada (Atlantic) & Australasia	120,000
Canada, the West Indies & South America	225,500
Canada & South Africa	146,000
Canada (Pacific) & Australasia	180,509
Canada, China & Japan	121,666
Canada & France	200,000
Making a total of	2,088,675

The remainder of the total expenditures of $2,703,200 was devoted to a few minor steamship services to Great Britain, and to the encouragement of steamship lines in the Canadian coastwise trade.

All of these Canadian steamship subsidies were given to ships of British register. It was stipulated in the contracts "that two-thirds of the total number of officers, engineers, stewards, crew, or other employees whatsoever upon the steamships engaged in the performance of the service herein contracted for shall be British subjects," except as the minister of trade and commerce might in individual cases allow otherwise. It was stipulated further in the Canadian subsidy contracts that:

The contractors shall not, nor shall any of their agents or servants or officers or crew of the said steamers, receive or permit to be received on board of the said steamers any letters for conveyance other than those contained in His Majesty's mails, or which are or may be privileged by law, or the mails of any other country, except such as are specified by the postmaster general of Canada for the time being.

It was also stipulated that:

The steamer employed in carrying out the provisions of this contract shall not on any of its trips call at any foreign port not specified in this contract.

The aim of this is to prevent the steamers subsidized by Canada from calling at the ports of the United States.

For the year 1914 a subsidy of $340,666 is to be allowed to the Royal Mail Steam Packet Co. for a fortnightly service from St. John and Halifax to the British West Indies and British Guiana, South America. These ships are not allowed to touch at any American port, and it is expected that the line, with a subsidy to pay the tolls, will be continued through the Panama Canal when the canal is opened.

JAPAN AND THE PANAMA CANAL.

The enterprising Japanese nation is preparing for the large use of the canal, and the indications are that that country will pay the tolls on Japanese ships from the public treasury. The American minister to Japan, Hon. George W. Guthrie, in a supplemental consular report for April 13, 1914, to be found in the Daily Consular and Trade Reports, May 1, 1914, states that the policy of the Japanese Government with reference to the Panama Canal is further shown in the plan of subsidizing a trans-Panama steamship line, as explained by the minister of communications at a meeting of the budget committee in the Lower House of the Diet. While the details of the plan have not yet been fully decided, it is said that the service contemplates eight steamers of 9,000 tons or more each. The proposed ports of call are as follows:

Eastern line: Outward voyage—Yokohama, Seattle, Panama, Colon, and New York; inward voyage—New York, New Orleans, Colon, Panama, Seattle, and Yokohama.
Western line: Outward voyage—Yokohama, Kobe, Moji, Shanghai, Manila, and Hongkong; inward voyage—Hongkong, Manila, Shanghai, Moji, Kobe, and Yokohama.

With regard to the proposal to make Seattle one of the ports of call in place of Honolulu, the Japanese Government claimed that while the distance from Yokohama to New York by the former route is 120 nautical miles longer than by the latter, Seattle offers better and cheaper coaling facilities than Honolulu. On the other hand, it is alleged that one, if not the chief, reason for the proposal is based on a desire to assign the trans-Panama service to the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, and as this company already runs a line to Seattle, the natural course in such case would be to make the New York line an extension of it. This inference is confirmed by the proposed redistribution of subsidies for the next period, under which the amount granted in the North America (Seattle and Tacoma) services is reduced from $905,440 to $374,781, the latter amount representing the future aid to be extended to the Osaka Shosen Kaisha line to Tacoma only, while the Nippon Yusen Kaisha line to Seattle is to be replaced by the New York line with a separate subsidy.

The annual amounts of Japanese subsidy proposed in aid of the trans-Panama service during a period of five years, commencing with 1915, are as follows: 1915–16, $718,307; 1916–17, $841,116; 1917–18, $875,447; 1918–19, $875,447; 1919–20, $875,447. The sums are smaller than those allotted to the San Francisco line, which during the same period are: 1915–16, $1,180,924; 1916–17, $1,137,113; 1917–18, $1,071,495; 1918–19, $1,005,877; 1919–20, $940,259.

The foregoing program of subvention still awaits the approval of the Diet. In presenting the plan to the Diet the minister of communications expressed the opinion that the opening of the Panama Canal would exert an immense influence upon American-Japanese trade, and that the Government had decided upon the necessity of subsidizing a trans-Panama line after full consultation with the chambers of commerce and shipping unions of the country.

Mr. President, from what I have submitted it will be seen that the statement I made on the 25th day of April was substantially accurate.

In this connection I wish to call attention to the efforts continually being made by foreign countries in behalf of their merchant marine, and against which the practically unaided shipping of the United States has to contend. In a speech I delivered on March 30 I presented a table of subsidies paid by foreign Governments to their shipping, aggregating $45,224,513, and inasmuch as the United States pays no direct subsidies to its shipping, and a very small amount in the matter of ocean mail pay, it requires no argument to prove that we are at a tremendous disadvantage in competition with the other maritime countries of the world. On that account, largely, our over-seas shipping has been destroyed, and it now becomes a question as to whether or not we will protect our coastwise shipping from the dangers that threaten it.

REMISSION OF SUEZ TOLLS.

Mr. President, on the 25th day of April, as I was about to leave the city for a visit to my home, I briefly discussed a resolution I had offered dealing with the question of the remission of tolls at Suez on the part of European Governments, which, if followed at Panama, as it doubtless will be, will place our shipping at a great disadvantage with foreign shipping. Since my return I notice in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] discussed the question, saying, among other things:

I think the statements made in the preamble—

Referring to the resolution I had offered—are not characterized by the accuracy usually employed by the Senator from New Hampshire. He states that "Whereas all nations largely engaged in commerce now pay either indirectly or specifically the tolls of their principal national lines of steamships passing through the Suez Canal."

And so forth.

Let me suggest that the word "indirectly" refers to the practice of Governments like Great Britain and Germany, which subsidize their principal lines through Suez, ostensibly for mail or other considerations. The wording of the preamble to the resolution I offered follows closely the very precise and well-considered language of the senior Senator from Massachusetts in his speech of April 9 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 6454, second column), the language being:

Almost all the nations largely engaged in commerce now pay either indirectly or specifically the tolls of their vessels passing through the Suez Canal. They will undoubtedly do the same thing for their vessels which pass through the Panama Canal.

The official report of the Commissioner of Navigation for 1911, page 16, states, on the authority of the company's report, that the Suez Canal dues on ships and passengers of the Peninsular & Oriental Co., a British corporation, in 1910 were £357,989 4s. 7d., and its subsidies £297,143 6s. 8d. The report also states that the North German Lloyd subsidy is $1,385,160, which, so says the Commissioner of Navigation, "would have sufficed to pay all the tolls and leave a handsome margin."

The distinguished Senator from Ohio added:

There are but three countries which specifically rebate tolls paid on vessels going through the Suez Canal. Those countries are Russia, Austria-Hungary, and Sweden.

The Senator from Ohio apparently overlooked the new 25-year ocean mail contract between the French Government and the Messageries Maritimes, by which the Suez tolls are specifically reimbursed to the company "in addition to the subsidy," using the language of the contract. This is very significant. So that to Russia, Austria-Hungary, and Sweden, which specifically rebate their tolls, must now be added France.

Mr. President, it does not make any real, practical difference whether the subsidies granted to the ships passing through Suez are given specifically to pay the tolls or nominally for some other purpose. In either case the desired result is achieved, which is sure to be followed by foreign Governments in the same way at Panama. The statement made by me was entirely accurate and justified by the official report of the Commissioner of Navigation and the text of the French Government contract with the Messageries Maritimes.

The policy already adopted by other Governments at Suez, and certain to be followed by them at Panama, of virtually providing free passage for their principal lines of steamers, has a vital bearing on the question whether tolls shall be paid or shall not be paid by American coastwise ships, and should be considered at the same time and in the same connection as the proposed repeal of the exemption clause.

COASTWISE TONNAGE—HOW OWNED.

And now, Mr. President, a few words on another important phase of the subject under consideration.

The statement has been repeated again and again in the course of the debate on the tolls question that 90 per cent of American coastwise tonnage is owned or controlled by railroads or combinations. Nothing could be further from the facts. This assertion is made to support the demand for repeal of the exemption provision of the Panama Canal act, and presumably also for a repeal of our coastwise legislation which has been on the statute books for nearly a century. The statement arises from a misunderstanding of the precise language of the report of Prof. Huebner, of the University of Pennsylvania, and of Chairman ALEXANDER, of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, in summing up the investigation into shipping trusts and combinations. The House committee found, in the first place, the important fact that practically all the foreign steamship lines that ply from our ports in foreign trade were included in trusts or combinations, and also that many or most of the regular-line service in the coastwise trade belonged to railroads or to shipping combinations—these combinations being large steamship companies, one of them the Eastern Steamship Corporation of New England, and the other the Atlantic, Gulf & West India Co., of which the Ward Line is a part.

The fact is, Mr. President, that the bulk of our coastwise tonnage is made up of coal and lumber carriers, and so forth—"tramp" vessels, steam and sail, that go to any port where business carries them. As a result nearly seven-eighths of the tonnage in the American coastwise trade on the Atlantic, the Gulf, the Great Lakes, and the Pacific belongs neither to railroads nor to combinations, but is controlled by private shipowners, who must number many thousands in all. Besides the regular coast lines controlled by railroads, the only railroad-owned tonnage, so far as I know, is a certain number of coal barges owned or controlled by the coal roads of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia.

The claim that American coastwise shipping is a "trust" or "monopoly" is attempted to be sustained by quotations from the recent report of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries on "Steamship agreements and affiliations in the American foreign and domestic trade."

These quotations are as follows (report as above, vol. 4, pp. 403–406):

The foregoing chapters discuss the control of regular line services in the most important divisions of this country's domestic commerce. With the exception of the Pacific coast trade proper, it was shown that the line of traffic is handled by comparatively few companies and that these are largely controlled by railroads and shipping consolidations. Thus, in the entire Atlantic and Gulf coastwise trade (exclusive of all inland waterway and purely local carriers), 28 lines, representing 235 steamers of 349,821 gross tons, furnish the line service. Of this number of lines, 10 are railroad owned and represent 128 steamers of 340,084 gross tons, or 54.5 per cent of the total number of steamers in the trade and 61.9 per cent of the tonnage. Seven lines operating 71 steamers of 175,971 gross tons in the coastwise trade belong to the Eastern Steamship Corporation and the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines and represent in the aggregate nearly 30 per cent of the total number of steamers and 32 per cent of the tonnage. Combining the two interests, it appears that the railroads and two Atlantic coast shipping consolidations control nearly 85 per cent of the steamers and nearly 94 per cent of the gross tonnage engaged in the entire Atlantic and Gulf coastwise trade. Attention may be called again to the fact that very few of the routes between any two ports on the entire Atlantic and Gulf coasts are served by more than one line.

On the Great Lakes the through package freight from the western gateways to eastern seaports via Buffalo is controlled exclusively by six railroad-owned boat lines, and these six lines represent 63 steamers of 180,007 gross tons, or approximately 47 per cent of the line steamers and 64 per cent of the line tonnage operating on the Great Lakes. Exclusive of ferry companies and strictly passenger lines, 17 other freight lines of some importance connect various Lake ports. These, however, represent but slightly more than one-third of the Great Lakes line tonnage. Most of these independent lines are comparatively small, none engages in the through traffic from western terminal centers, and seven report that they encounter no direct competition from other water carriers.

Even in the Pacific coast trade (including the intercoastal trade), where independent steamship lines make a more prominent showing than in either the Atlantic coast or Great Lakes trade, railroads and shipping consolidations represent a large proportion of the total tonnage. The 15 lines already noted as operating in this trade represent (after excluding steamers engaged in the foreign trade) a total of 106 steamers of 350,512 gross tons. Three of these lines are owned by railroads and four by shipping consolidations, and represent a combined total of 68 steamers of 172,679 gross tons, or over 64 per cent of the total number of steamers for the 15 lines and over 49 per cent of the tonnage.

Considering all the line services noted in the preceding chapters as engaged in coastwise and Great Lakes trade, the following totals appear: The lines number 66; the steamers operated strictly in the domestic trade, 474; and the gross tonnage of these steamers, 1,180,897 tons. Of these totals, 19 railroads control 209 steamers (44.1 per cent of the total) and 589,561 gross tons (nearly 50 per cent of the total). Eleven lines belong to shipping consolidations and operate 121 steamers (25.5 per cent of the total) of 279,180 gross tons (23.6 per cent of the total). All told, the 30 lines referred to in the preceding chapters as controlled by railroads or shipping consolidations operate 330 steamers of 868,741 gross tons, or nearly 70 per cent of the tonnage.

Those who quote this language habitually ignore the fact that it is only the "regular-line" service that is considered—a relatively small or minority part of the total coastwise merchant marine, which is composed, as already suggested, mainly of general cargo or "tramp" tonnage—of steamers, barges, and sail vessels operating not on regular routes, but wherever there is freight to convey.

The quoted report of the Merchant Marine Committee of the House of Representatives cites as "controlled by railroads or shipping consolidations" only "330 steamers of 868,741 gross tons," which are described as embodying "nearly 70 per cent of the total number of steamers and 74 per cent of the tonnage" of the companies engaged in this regular-line service, on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, the Great Lakes, and the Gulf of Mexico. But the total coastwise merchant marine of the United States on June 30, 1913, according to the report of the Bureau of Navigation for 1913 (page 7), consisted of 27,070 vessels of 7,886,518 tons. Of this immense shipping, 24,765 vessels of 6,858,742 gross tons were enrolled and licensed vessels engaged in the coastwise trade—only 1,027,776 gross tons being registered for foreign commerce. Therefore it follows that the 330 steamers of 868,741 gross tons described by the Merchant Marine Committee as "controlled by railroads or shipping consolidations," constitute only about one-eighth of the entire coastwise merchant shipping of the United States, which consists, all told, as has been said, of 24,765 vessels of 6,858,742 gross tons. That is, nearly seven-eighths of the tonnage of the American merchant marine in coastwise trade is not included in the line service of these railroad companies or steamship consolidations.

The most notable recent development of the American merchant marine has been in steam vessels of the all-around "tramp" or cargo-carrying type, built in part on the Great Lakes and in part in shipyards of the Atlantic seaboard. Most of these vessels are owned and controlled in New England and New York. Such ships are engaged in the carrying of coal, lumber, sugar, molasses, cotton, sulphur, phosphate rock, and so forth. They are of a type expressly calculated for service through the Panama Canal. So far as is known, none of these "tramp" ships are owned by railroads or by shipping consolidations. They are increasing in number more rapidly relatively than the steamers of the regular coastwise lines.

A trust or monopoly of 24,765 vessels of 6,858,742 tons has never been effected and never could be effected. Many of these vessels are small craft, but a great many of them are of a seagoing type. Such a multitude of units never could be brought together—the task has never been undertaken. It would be about as practicable to form a trust monopoly of owners of automobiles or of farm wagons. The service which the general freight-carrying coastwise merchant fleet of this country renders has always been distinctively and keenly competitive in its character. Until now nobody has ever asserted otherwise.

Not only is there no trust or monopoly dominating the coastwise merchant marine of the United States—nearly seven-eighths of its tonnage as has been shown being outside the lines found to be controlled by railroads or steamship consolidations—but by the terms of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, any trust or monopoly control of coastwise shipping through the Panama Canal is made absolutely impossible. Section 11 of this act provides:

SEC. 11. That section 5 of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, is hereby amended by adding thereto a new paragraph at the end thereof as follows:

"From and after the 1st day of July, 1914, it shall be unlawful for any railroad company or other common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce to own, lease, operate, control, or have any interests whatsoever (by stock ownership or otherwise, either directly, indirectly, through any holding company, or by stockholders or directors in common, or in any other manner) in any common carrier by water operated through the Panama Canal or elsewhere, with which said railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic or any vessel carrying freight or passengers upon said water route or elsewhere with which said railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic; and in case of the violation of this provision each day in which such violation continues shall be deemed a separate offense."

Jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine questions of fact as to the competition or possibility of competition, after full hearing, on the application of any railroad company or other carrier. Such application may be filed for the purpose of determining whether any existing service is in violation of this section and pray for an order permitting the continuance of any vessel or vessels already in operation or for the purpose of asking an order to install new service not in conflict with the provisions of this paragraph. The commission may on its own motion or the application of any shipper institute proceedings to inquire into the operation of any vessel in use by any railroad or other carrier which has not applied to the commission and had the question of competition or the possibility of competition determined as herein provided. In all such cases the order of said commission shall be final.

This section would bar completely from the Panama Canal any steamship owned by a railroad company or in which a railroad company had any direct or indirect interest. A subsequent paragraph of section 11 of this same act bars also all ships owned by trusts or monopolies, as follows:

No vessel permitted to engage in the coastwise or foreign trade of the United States shall be permitted to enter or pass through said canal if such ship is owned, chartered, operated, or controlled by any person or company which is doing business in violation of the provisions of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," or the provisions of sections 73 to 77, both inclusive, of an act approved August 27, 1894, entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," or the provisions of any other act of Congress amending or supplementing the said act of July 2, 1890, commonly known as the Sherman Antitrust Act, and amendments thereto, or said sections of the act of August 27, 1894. The question of fact may be determined by the judgment of any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction in any cause pending before it to which the owners or operators of such ship are parties. Suit may be brought by any shipper or by the Attorney General of the United States.

It should be added that the American coastwise steamship lines now actively preparing to use the canal are not in any case described by the Merchant Marine Committee as owned either by railroads or by steamship consolidations. They are included by the committee among the independent lines. The Pacific Mail steamers from San Francisco to Panama and the Panama Railroad Co.'s steamers from New York City to Colon will presumably not enter the canal when it is opened. The other lines now preparing to use the canal are—

American-Hawaiian Steamship Co., 26 ships, already in operation from Atlantic coast, via Isthmus of Tehuantepec, to Pacific coast ports and Hawaii.

Luckenbach Steamship Co., 10 steamships, already in operation from Atlantic ports, via Straits of Magellan, to Pacific coast ports and from Pacific coast ports to Panama.

W. R. Grace & Co., 4 ships, already in operation from New York and Philadelphia, via Straits of Magellan, to San Francisco and Puget Sound.

John S. Emery & Co. (Inc.), 2 ships building and more to be chartered, from Boston through the canal to San Francisco and Puget Sound.

Red Star Line, 2 ships now in trans-Atlantic service; plans yet unannounced.

Newspaper dispatches of March 6, 1914, stated that—

New Orleans, Port Arthur, and Galveston business men are organizing a steamship company to operate coastwise steamships from these ports through Panama to the Pacific seaboard.

It is estimated by shipping authorities that the American steamship companies which have already signified their intention to run steamers through the Panama Canal from coast to coast will have enough steamers when the canal is completed to dispatch a ship from the Atlantic or from the Pacific coast practically every business day throughout the year.

This is for the regular-line service, in addition to the "tramp" business, bulk-cargo carriers of coal, grain, asphalt, and lumber, for which in the past two or three years many steamships well adapted have been built on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts and on the Great Lakes.

Coastwise carriers of the Atlantic seaboard are owned in two ways—either by corporations organized to carry on the shipping trade, whose stock, as a rule, is widely distributed, or by groups of individual owners, each possessing a certain number of "shares." These shares may be thirty-seconds or sixty-fourths, and this is the manner of ownership traditionally pursued in the old sail-ship days. Relatively few of these coastwise carriers—and these are apt to be small craft—are owned altogether by an individual. In New England, particularly, the ownership of the coastwise vessels is widely subdivided among thousands of shareholders or stockholders, the great majority being persons of moderate means. From what I have said it clearly appears that the charge that a coastwise-shipping trust exists in this country is absolutely without foundation and ought not to be repeated in this Chamber or elsewhere.

THE QUESTION OF SUBSIDY.

Mr. President, this is not a party question. The President is entitled to our confidence and respect unreservedly, and in all matters of public policy to our support in so far as we can conscientiously accord it, but the mere fact that he proclaims that he is opposed to subsidy in every form does not in the least justify either the Senate or the administration in the gratuitous sacrifice of such an invaluable commercial asset as the right to give by exemption of tolls an encouragement to our merchant marine. The history of no political party and no party leader, either in this country or abroad, justifies any such claim of infallibility as the attitude of the administration implies; and so I venture to say that the administration would not be in such hot haste to sweep American shipping from the face of the sea, possibly for all time, if it truly realized that after all the President may be mistaken about this matter and may have to reverse himself as he has been forced to do about some other equally cherished delusions. Indeed, if we are to admit that the remission of tolls to American coastwise vessels is a subsidy, then it follows that every deepened waterway and broadened channel, every lock and every canal on our lakes, along the coast, and upon our rivers, built by national appropriations and used by our shipping, is a subsidy. The Democratic Party, not less than other parties, has had its honorable share in these great internal improvements, and in that way has granted enormous subsidies to foreign shipping, for whose benefit most of the great expenditures on the seacoast have been made.

After all, perhaps a little introspection of the subsidy question, instead of stargazing around it, will suffice to show it is not such a terrible thing as our friends imagine. If the argument of the repealers on this subject is correct, we undoubtedly have been unconsciously subsidizing the church for years in this country. I can easily show you over $25,000,000 worth of church property right here in Washington that pays the Government no taxes, to which nobody objects, and surely that is as much a contribution to a class as any subsidy ever suggested for American shipping would be. If the theory we are asked to commit ourselves to holds good, to be consistent we should have a tollgate at Cape Henry, another at Sandy Hook, and at least two at New Orleans. How about the subsidy to the common schools that the rich now so cheerfully concede to the poor, the well-to-do to those who want to do well in this country? If free passage through the canal is a subsidy, how about the income tax, patents, appropriations to destroy the boll weevil and the gypsy moth, and for the encouragement of industries purely local in their character, such as the raising of live stock in the cane-sugar and cotton districts of the United States, to be found in the Agricultural appropriation bill now before the Senate? Very likely that is intended to be a legislative placebo or a consolation prize for the destruction by Congress of the sugar industry of the State of Louisiana. However that may be, it is a bald subsidy, notwithstanding the senior Senator from Louisiana a few days ago declared with great unction that "subsidy grates on the ears of Democrats." And I might well ask, What about the subsidy in the naval appropriation bill which grants free passage to vessels through the Panama Canal en route to or returning from the Panama-Pacific International Exposition?

So, I pray, Senators, let us not needlessly burn our bridges over this river which we shall surely have to recross later on unless we propose to let our more enterprising neighbors drive the Stars and Stripes utterly from the seas, which they have already largely accomplished.

It is within the memory of many of us that Democracy bitterly opposed the abolition of slavery, the safeguarding the integrity of the Union with arms, the prosecution to a finish of the Civil War, and the establishment of the gold standard. It has had confident convictions on other subjects—free silver and free trade, for instance, both of which delusions it has surrendered, partially at least, and must still further modify if it is to remain in power; therefore something more than a human conviction should be insisted upon before we consent to give up something that all the civilized world beyond our boundaries believes to be the most potent weapon ever forged for defense or offense on the ocean. In the face of the fact that almost every public-school boy knows that both of the great English parties—the Whig and the Tory—have been on every side of every political question that has ever been exploited in Great Britain, it is only reasonable to suppose that the Democratic Party is destined to change front about this matter as frankly and completely as it has done about other national questions that used to widely divide us. Indeed, in this debate at least two distinguished Democratic Senators have already committed themselves to the policy of granting relief in the form of subsidies to American shipping.

There was a time when the American flag was seen in every port of the civilized world, while now it is rarely seen outside of our own borders. The destruction of our over-seas shipping is absolutely pathetic and a reproach to a nation that leads all the world in wealth, in manufactures, in mining, and in agriculture. The time is sure to come when all parties will unite—Democrats, Republicans, and men of all other political beliefs—in a demand that we shall no longer neglect our merchant marine, but that it shall be rehabilitated by the same methods that other nations employ, and that is through governmental aid in the shape of appropriations from the National Treasury.

This matter of vacillation and changing of front of the Democratic Party on the important questions of the day is convincingly illustrated in the utterances of the present occupant of the White House. Every member of his party not only admits but glories in the assertion that Woodrow Wilson is one of the greatest exponents of Democratic principles that ever lived. His words and actions therefore may be considered as typically Democratic, and his repudiation of his party's platform declaration on the matter of tolls, which he indorsed during the campaign, is notorious.

In a speech at Washington Park, N. J., on August 15, 1912, Mr. Wilson, among other things, said:

Now, at present there are no ships to do that, and one of the bills pending—passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate as it had passed the House—provides for free toll for American ships through that canal and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by any American railroad company. You see the object of that, don't you? [Applause.] We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent.

Compare this language with the words of his message to Congress on the same subject, which is familiar to everyone.

Another illustration of the delightful inconsistency of the occupant of the White House is given in the following letters, in which is shown his varying estimates of his amiable Secretary of State:

PRINCETON UNIVERSITY, PRINCETON, N. J.,
President's Room, April 29, 1907.

MY DEAR MR. JOLINE: Thank you very much for sending me your address at Parsons, Kans., before the board of directors of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Co. I have read it with relish and entire agreement. Would that we could do something, at once dignified and effective, to knock Mr. Bryan once for all into a cocked hat.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. ADRIAN H. JOLINE.

WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 5, 1914.

MY DEAR MR. MARBURY: I have your letter of January 30. * * * Your reference to the Secretary of State shows how comprehensively you have looked on during the last few months. Not only have Mr. Bryan's character, his justice, his sincerity, his transparent integrity, his Christian principle, made a deep impression upon all with whom he has dealt, but his tact in dealing with men of many sorts, his capacity for business, his mastery of the principles in each matter he has been called upon to deal with, have cleared away many a difficulty and have given to the policy of the State Department a definiteness and dignity that are very admirable.

I need not say what pleasure and profit I myself have taken from close association with Mr. Bryan, or how thoroughly he has seemed to all of us who are associated with him here to deserve not only our confidence but our affectionate admiration.

Sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. WILLIAM L. MARBURY, Baltimore, Md.

Other instances without number could be given showing the facility with which the President is able to suit his utterances to what he considers the needs of the hour, but enough has been said to indicate a bare possibility that the failure to repeal the exemption provision may not be such a dire calamity as the President would have us believe. On the contrary, it would be quite within the precedents to find him in a short time advocating exemption of tolls quite as loudly as he now denounces them.

THE REPEAL IS NOT NECESSARY AS A MATTER OF POLICY.

Many arguments have been advanced tending to show that the repeal of the exemption clause is desirable as a matter of "policy." This can be considered from but two viewpoints. Either it is a poor economic proposition to extend aid to our coastwise shipping by means of the exemption of tolls or it is a menace to our foreign policy to stand on our rights in refusing to accede to the demands of Great Britain. At least one of the Senators who has taken the latter position, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who has always cast his vote in favor of assisting our merchant marine, now holds that we should not exercise the right of discrimination simply because we possess it, largely because of the effect upon our foreign policy. This is probably true of nearly all the Senators who will vote in favor of repeal on the ground of policy.

What can there be in our relations with foreign Governments that would be jeopardized or imperiled by a firm stand on our rights? One would think that such a position would win the respect and compel the admiration of all nations, and that future negotiations would be greatly facilitated if it was clearly understood that we did not propose to deviate from the fundamental doctrines of this Government. Is there anything in the Mexican situation to warrant such a suggestion? It would seem that a little more firmness and insistence in the beginning on our demands upon Mexico for reparation and punishment of guilty parties would have been productive of beneficent results. As a consequence of our vacillating Mexican policy we are said to be the laughingstock of the world. If we yield in this matter our position will be rendered still more ridiculous. A weak retreat from the stand we have taken will simply be an incentive to Japan to renew with fresh vigor her claims in California, and other nations will probably immediately resurrect old grievances and insist on decisions favorable to them.

INTERPRETATION OF THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

If all the Senators who believe we have an undeniable right under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to grant exemption from Panama Canal tolls to our coastwise shipping were to vote against the repeal of the exemption clause, it can not be doubted that the proposition would be defeated. It may be contended, therefore, that arguments could be directed more effectively toward the question of exercising that right at the present time. This I propose to do before I complete my remarks, but at this point I wish to point out what, to my mind, are fallacious constructions sought to be attached to the treaty by those who favor repeal.

In the first place, that part of the preamble of the treaty is quoted which says that it is negotiated "without impairing the 'general principle' of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention," referring to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850. Let us, therefore, study the wording of that article to see if any of its provisions are impaired by the exemption from tolls of American ships.

THE ORIGINAL CONTRACT OF 1850.

The precise words of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850 are as follows:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain, having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable, and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

It is seen that the United States and Great Britain agreed to extend their "protection" to the canal route, wherever it might be located. Now, read carefully the second sentence of the article. It simply means that in consideration of the protection granted jointly by the United States and Great Britain no charges or conditions of traffic shall be imposed other "than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable."

In other words, to quote Hon. JOSEPH HOWELL, Representative in Congress from Utah:

The principle laid down and clearly established in this article is that protection is the price paid for equal treatment. Simply this and nothing more. Protection and equality of treatment stand in the relation of cause and effect.

This consideration is also extended to other Governments which may undertake to guarantee similar protection. Are we to understand that Great Britain undertakes to give "protection" to our canal, built with our own money, on our own soil, or that other countries have indicated that they will do the same thing? The suggestion is preposterous, and the whole argument for equal tolls based on this proposition must fall to the ground.

When this matter of joint protection of the canal was under consideration there was absolutely not the slightest intimation that the United States would build the canal with its own money and on its own territory. In the great speech on the subject by Senator Clayton March 9, 1853, not a reference to such a thing can be found. Even such an advocate of exclusive control of the canal by the United States as Stephen A. Douglas did not offer such a suggestion. In a speech in answer to that of Mr. Clayton Mr. Douglas used these words:

In his last speech the Senator—Mr. Clayton—chose to persevere in representing me as the advocate of a canal to be made through Central America, with funds from the Treasury of the United States. I need not remind the Senator that he had no authority from anything I have said to attribute to me such a purpose. I certainly did not assume any such position, while my remarks were calculated to negative such an idea.

Is it to be supposed that had it been known that the canal was to be built with our own money on our own soil the protection of Great Britain or any other country would have been solicited or accepted? Of course not; and as it was built with our own money and on our own soil, and we are to maintain and protect it we receive no "protection" from Great Britain, and therefore we are not bound to admit her ships to the canal on equal terms with our own.

ALL RULES OF EQUAL FORCE.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty contains six rules for the purpose of governing the operation of the canal. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and other Senators have put the matter very plainly when they said:

It seems unreasonable to suppose, as I have already said, that when five out of the six of the treaty rules do not apply to the United States the sixth was intended to apply.

The rules are as follows:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents, and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

It would seem that either all the rules apply to the use of the canal by this country or none of them have application to such use. Suppose they all do apply, then the United States, in its own canal, would be subject to the following restrictions:

First. We could not blockade the canal.

Second. We could not exercise a right of war or commit an act of hostility within the canal.

If at war with any other nation—

Third. We could not revictual or take on stores in the canal, except as strictly necessary.

Fourth. Transit through the canal would have to be made with least possible delay.

Fifth. We could not embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal.

Sixth. We could not allow our vessels to remain in the canal or within 3 miles of either end longer than 24 hours.

It is manifestly absurd to contend that the United States is controlled by the rules I have just outlined, and it is equally absurd to claim that the rule prescribing equality of tolls applies to the United States if all the others do not.

Again, by reference to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, it is seen that "the United States adopts * * * the following rules." Is it reasonable to suppose that the party who promulgates the rules is to be bound thereby? The treaty also says:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules.

Suppose the United States did not observe the rules which she herself has laid down, is she then to be denied the use of her own canal; and if so, who will undertake the enforcement of the denial? It would seem that the contention is manifestly too ridiculous to be seriously considered.

NEUTRALIZATION.

Much stress has been laid upon the so-called neutralization clause of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, namely, article 8. It is claimed that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty must be construed in the light of this article, and that this neutralization provision guarantees absolute "equality" between the citizens of Great Britain and the United States. Nothing could be further from the truth.

Let us see what the real meaning of "neutralization" is. Ex-Senator Foraker, whose high standing as a lawyer is everywhere recognized, gives the following definition:

The well-defined and established primary meaning of "neutralization" has reference to conditions of war and the rights and duties of belligerents. There can not be any neutral port unless there are belligerents, and there are no belligerents in time of peace—only in time of war.

Neutrality means the equal treatment of the belligerents compared one with another, but not the equal treatment of belligerents with the nation to which the neutral port may belong. Assuming the United States to be the neutral nation we could not show favor to one or the other of warring nations without violating the rules of international law applicable, and thus laying ourselves liable to be called to account by the injured belligerent. There is nothing in the treaty to indicate that the word as used was to have any other than its ordinary meaning, and this ordinary meaning has no reference to peace or the conditions of peace, but only war and the conditions of war; but if we are to extend its application to rule 1 and make it apply to tolls in time of peace as well as in time of war, then, according to all rules of construction, neutrality in such new use would mean equal treatment accorded by the neutral nation to other nations, just as it does in every instance under its familiar application.

It is impossible to think of any case of neutrality or "neutralization," whether peaceful or warlike, without at least three parties being concerned—the neutral, who has no interest in the controversy, and the parties thereto who are entitled to equal treatment as between themselves, and, receiving that, have no claim of any kind against the neutral.

All things considered, the British contention is not only utterly untenable, but also utterly unjust.

I quote two additional definitions of the meaning of "neutralization." In Moore's International Law we find the following:

The idea of a neutral nation "implies two nations at war and a third in friendship with both."

Turning to Bouvier's Law Dictionary, the following definition is given:

The state of a nation which takes no part between two or more other nations at war with each other.

Neutrality consists in the observance of a strict and honest impartiality, so as not to afford advantage in the war to either party, and particularly in so far restraining its trade to the accustomed course which is held in time of peace as not to render assistance to one of the belligerents in escaping the effects of the other's hostilities.

It will thus be seen that the use of the word "neutralization" presupposes the existence of war, and has no reference whatever to the administration of the canal in time of peace. Therefore the "general principle" of neutralization established by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and which the Hay-Pauncefote treaty undertakes to perpetuate, has application only in regard to belligerents, and can not be considered as affecting in any way the matter of tolls in times of peace.

THE WELLAND CANAL.

During the debate great stress has been laid on the fact that after imposing discriminating tolls on our vessels through the Welland Canal Great Britain, in response to a protest from our Government, exempted our vessels from the payment of tolls through that waterway, and it has been suggested that that fact was an illustration of generosity on the part of Great Britain which we might well reciprocate by repealing the exemption provision of the Panama Canal act.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] laid great stress on that point, but the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] exploded that argument by showing that the action of Great Britain was simply a concession of a right that naturally and properly belonged to us, and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] also pointed out the fallacy of the claim. The fact is that in regard to the Welland Canal there is an agreement between the United States and the Dominion of Canada for mutual, reciprocal use of the Great Lakes and connecting waterways, including the American and Canadian canals at Sault Ste. Marie, the American St. Clair Canal, the Detroit River artificial channel, and the Welland and St. Lawrence Canals. Canada has improved some of these waterways and controls the Canadian Sault Ste. Marie, the Welland, and St. Lawrence Canals. She grants our vessels the use of these waterways on the same terms which her own ships enjoy. On the other hand, we grant her vessels similar use of the Soo Canal and the St. Clair and Detroit Channels, which have been deepened at enormous expense to the United States.

In other words, our use of the Canadian canals depends upon a special reciprocal arrangement. We give Canada certain privileges in our canals, and she gives us certain privileges in return. The whole question is well illustrated by the two canals at Sault Ste. Marie, paralleling each other on opposite sides of the river. Canada has built and maintains one. We have built and maintain another, and we are now constructing a very much deeper waterway on our side. If Canada had built at Panama at equal cost a canal paralleling ours, she would have a perfect right, as distinguished from all the other nations of the world, to come to us and say, "If you will pass our vessels free through your canal, we will pass yours free through ours."

But no such Canadian canal at Panama exists. We have built the only canal at the Isthmus at our own expense, and neither Canada nor any other nation has a right to come to us and demand that we shall follow at Panama the same policy which, under absolutely different conditions, we have followed on the Canadian border. If at some future time Canada or some other nation shall build a canal across the American Isthmus, then a condition comparable to that on the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence would develop.

As a matter of fact, Canada did, prior to 1896, remit a part of the toll on the Welland Canal on grain carried to Montreal or Europe, and when we protested Canada insisted that she was well within her rights. She did not yield until we threatened to refuse free passage to her ships through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal. Then she granted to us equality in the Welland Canal as a matter of expediency, but by so doing she did not place us under obligation to her in any respect.

To put it concisely, Canada bought her privileges in our lake channels at a price of equal privileges in her own waterways, but no nation is in a position to do this at Panama.

VIEWS OF THOSE WHO PARTICIPATED IN THE PREPARATION OF THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

In the consideration of this question it seems to me that it is of vital interest to understand just what the writers of the treaty conceived its real meaning to be. During the consideration of the treaty in the Senate Senator Bard, of California, introduced an amendment, as follows:

The United States reserves the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade.

This amendment was defeated by a vote of 43 to 27, but practically all of the Senators who voted in the negative, including myself, did so because they thought we had the undoubted right of discrimination in the treaty as it stood, and that the adoption of the amendment would be simply cumbering the treaty with useless language. Senator Bard himself admits that it was generally conceded that we had that right, and that his amendment was simply to remove all question or doubt. Ex-Senator

Foraker, in referring to the contention that we are prohibited from discriminations in favor of our own ships, says:

There is a preposterous absurdity in such a conclusion, and I should feel deeply mortified to think that I had favored and supported a measure that was capable of such a construction.

Secretary of State John Hay, the plenipotentiary on the part of the United States in the negotiation of the treaty, sent to the Senate a history of the amendments proposed to the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which resulted in the negotiation of the second treaty that is now in force. His explanation of the meaning of the treaty at the time of its transmittal to that body was this:

The whole theory of the treaty is that the canal is to be an entirely American canal. The enormous cost of constructing it is to be borne by the United States alone. When constructed it is exclusively the property of the United States, and is to be managed and controlled and defended by it. * * * The United States alone, as the sole owner of the canal, as a purely American enterprise, adopts and prescribes the rules by which the use of the canal shall be regulated and assumes the entire responsibility and burden of enforcing, without the assistance of Great Britain or of any other nation, its absolute neutrality.

The quotation shows the views of the man who, above all others, was in a position to know and understand the true meaning and intent of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. No stronger or more emphatic language could have been used by him, and this one argument is sufficient, in my opinion, on which to base my contention.

It is utterly unconscionable to suppose that true Americans, such as John Hay and those associated with him in the negotiation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, would have considered for a moment the surrender of the right to do with this canal exactly what we saw fit. As I have already suggested, it was built with our own money, on our own territory, by our own labor and ingenuity, without the slightest aid or suggestion from Great Britain or any other power, and, according to all rules of equity, justice, fair play, and common sense, we are privileged to control its affairs precisely as we wish. That view was held by President Roosevelt, President Taft, and Secretary of State Knox.

One of the latest utterances made on this point is by Dr. David Jayne Hill, Assistant Secretary of State under John Hay at the time the treaty now in force was negotiated, who afterwards was American ambassador to Germany and who is recognized as an authority on international law. In a recent number of the Saturday Evening Post, under the title of "The Meaning of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty," Dr. Hill reaches the conclusion that the treaty is observed in letter and spirit when the United States treats all nations alike in assessing canal tolls, and that they have no right to complain if the United States, the owner of the canal, passes its own vessels through free.

Another point made by Dr. Hill is important, and that is that if we are not to be given preferential treatment in regard to our coastwise vessels then all other governments should be required to pay proportionally the deficit that will accrue in the maintenance of the canal. The estimated annual cost of maintenance and operation of the canal, including interest and amortization, is $29,250,000, while the income from tolls, including tolls on American coastwise shipping, would be only $12,600,000. This would leave an annual deficit of $16,850,000. The tolls on coastwise shipping would amount to $1,200,000, leaving $15,650,000 to be reimbursed by foreign governments. It is estimated that the shipping of Great Britain passing through the canal will be more than half of the total.

I would like to inquire of any Senator who favors the repeal of the exemption clause whether this proposition is not a just and fair one. Why should we, having built the canal, provided we admit the ships of all nations to the canal on the same terms as our own, be required to pay all the loss that occurs in the matter of interest, maintenance, and protection? The mere statement of this matter shows clearly that the United States is on a different footing from other nations in regard to the canal, for the reason that if we repeal the exemption provision the United States will be required to pay the deficit, and no foreign government will be asked to contribute a dollar. In other words we have built the canal, and must now bear greatly more than our share in maintaining it. How absurd that is. If the United States chooses to remit $1,200,000 to its coastwise shipping, thus making the deficit larger, why should foreign countries complain so long as they do not pay any part of the deficit? I wish that some Senator would frankly tell me why Dr. Hill's proposition is not a fair and equitable one.

Again, Mr. President, let us suppose that at some future time the canal is seriously damaged or destroyed by an earthquake or some other catastrophe, an event which may occur at any moment, will the nations who, if this bill passes, are to be granted in every respect equal privileges and benefits in that great waterway with ourselves rebuild it, or will that task, accompanied by another enormous expenditure of money, devolve upon the United States? The question answers itself, and it shows clearly the folly that we will perpetrate if we yield to the joint demands of Great Britain and the President of the United States on this question.

THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY IS OF NO EFFECT UNDER THE CONSTRUCTION GIVEN IT BY THOSE FAVORING REPEAL.

A word as to the treaty-making power.

In Wharton's International Law is found an illuminating discussion of the limitations of the treaty-making power of the President and Senate. I quote as follows:

That a treaty can not invade the constitutional prerogatives of the legislature is thus illustrated by a German author, who has given to the subject a degree of elaborate and extended exposition which it has received from no writer in our own tongue: "Congress has, under the Constitution, the right to lay taxes and imposts, as well as to regulate foreign trade, but the President and Senate, if the 'treaty-making power' be regarded as absolute, would be able to evade this limitation by adopting treaties which would compel Congress to destroy its whole tariff system. According to the Constitution, Congress has the right to determine questions of naturalization, of patents, and of copyright. Yet, according to the view here contested, the President and Senate, by a treaty, could on these important questions utterly destroy the legislative capacity of the House of Representatives. The Constitution gives Congress the control of the Army. Participation in this control would be snatched from the House of Representatives by a treaty with a foreign power by which the United States would bind itself to keep in the field an army of a particular size. The Constitution gives Congress the right of declaring war; this right would be illusory if the President and Senate could, by a treaty, launch the country into a foreign war. The power of borrowing money on the credit of the United States resides in Congress; this power would cease to exist if the President and Senate could, by treaty, bind the country to the borrowing of foreign funds. By the Constitution 'no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law,' but this limitation would cease to exist if, by a treaty, the United States could be bound to pay money to a foreign power. * * * Congress would cease to be the lawmaking power as is prescribed by the Constitution; the lawmaking power would be the President and the Senate. Such a condition would become the more dangerous from the fact that treaties so adopted, being on this particular hypothesis superior to legislation, would continue in force until superseded by other treaties. Not only, therefore, would a Congress consisting of two Houses be made to give way to an oligarchy of President and Senate, but the decrees of this oligarchy, when once made, could only be changed by concurrence of President and of senatorial majority of two-thirds." (Wharton, Int. Law Digest, art. 131a, I. 26.)

As has been suggested elsewhere, to this list of the powers of Congress delegated by the Constitution can well be added the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with Indian tribes." If the legislative power of the House of Representatives under this provision of the Constitution has been taken from them by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, as must be the case under the construction given to the treaty by those who favor repeal of the exemption clause, then the Senate apparently has exceeded its treaty-making power, and the treaty, in this respect at least, is of no effect whatever.

The Panama Canal was built with money received from taxation of the American people. The canal is therefore the property of the people. The President and Senate, constituting the treaty-making power, are simply the trustees of the people. Hon. Lewis M. Hosea, one of the ablest lawyers of Cincinnati, and but recently retired from the bench of the superior court of Ohio, has taken notice of the above principle, which he clothes with the following language:

Whosoever deals with a trustee, knowing him to be such, is bound to take notice of his powers and limitations.

This is a principle of common law, familiar in both England and the United States, and Judge Hosea comments on it as follows:

This is especially true of public officials who are mere agents and trustees of the public, charged with the performance of specific duties and intrusted with powers suitable to that end. An act of a public officer, therefore, within the scope of his duty and power binds the public; but if the act be not within the scope of such duty and power it does not bind the public, and one thus dealing with a trustee can take no benefit from his wrongful act.

If, therefore, under familiar legal principles common both in England and the United States, neither the President nor the Senate had power or authority to make a treaty with England, surrendering the local and interstate rights of the people incident to the construction of the canal and its use as a local highway connecting United States territory, then if the treaty does surrender such rights, it is void.

Edward Everett, as Secretary of State, on December 1, 1852, in a letter to the Compte De Sartiges, of Spain, in regard to a proposed convention stipulating that we would never annex Cuba, gave utterance to the following:

Now, it may well be doubted whether the Constitution of the United States would allow the treaty-making power to impose a permanent disability on the American Government for all coming time and prevent it under any future change of circumstances from doing what has been so often done in times past.

The provision in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty allowing "all nations" to use the canal on equal terms is, under the construction sought to be placed upon it by those who favor the repeal of the exemption provision, clearly an imposition of "a permanent disability on the American Government," and prevents it from doing what has been done many times in the past. At the time of the ratification of the treaty there were some very eminent constitutional lawyers in the Senate, and it is inconceivable that they would have allowed a treaty to be ratified if there was any suspicion that it would impose on this Government a permanent disability. The fact that that question was not raised in the debate clearly indicates that the construction now sought to be attached to the treaty is erroneous, and that we did not surrender any of our rights to the full and complete control of the canal.

It is a well-established rule of international law that where the circumstances surrounding the making of a treaty undergo material change the treaty becomes voidable at the option of either party. When the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was negotiated the supposition was that the canal was to be built in alien territory and by private capital. As a matter of fact it was built on territory belonging exclusively to the United States, and with the money of the people of the United States. This country is therefore not bound to adhere to the provisions of the treaty, even though the construction sought to be given it by those who favor repeal is admitted to be correct. If the views held by the advocates of repeal shall prevail, it will manifestly be the duty of this Government to abrogate the treaty, and get rid of the "permanent disability" it imposes on us.

Hon. Hannis Taylor, another eminent authority on international law, supports this argument in the following words:

The conclusion is irresistible that by the radical changes wrought in conditions existing at the time the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made, through subsequent purchase of the Canal Zone by the United States, the treaty as a whole became voidable. Or, to use the words of Prof. Oppenheim, that the vital change wrought by the subsequent purchase of the Canal Zone rendered an otherwise "unnotifiable treaty" notifiable. Under the universally accepted rule of rebus sic stantibus, so luminously expounded by the greatest of the recent English publicists, we have the right and Great Britain has the right to call a diplomatic conference in order to make such modifications in the terms of this voidable or "notifiable" treaty as either party may desire.

THE MORAL QUESTION.

It has been contended, in season and out of season, by certain Members of this body, notably the distinguished senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], that our national honor can only be upheld by the repeal of the exemption provision in the Panama Canal act. On that point I desire to say that some of us who are opposed to that exemption are just as sensitive upon this question of national honor as is the Senator from New York or any other man in or out of this Chamber. We take exception to the doctrine thus enunciated, and hold that we are subserving national honor to a greater extent by standing for what we conceive to be the rights of our people as against the protests from Great Britain or any other foreign country. I find no fault with those who entertain views opposite from those I hold, but I do find fault with any suggestion from any quarter that our national honor can only be upheld and promoted by yielding to the demands of Great Britain on this important subject.

Mr. President, if there be any moral issue that touches this case, it is, in my opinion, whether we shall or shall not suffer ourselves and the American people to become demoralized by our want of moral courage and conduct in this vital matter. A pledge solemnly made in writing to the electorate of this country, openly and unconditionally proclaimed by each and every one of the great political parties, soliciting popular approval and support at the polls, should be a moral law to those who uttered it not to be lightly cast aside by its authors. It is undeniable that to break such a unanimously plighted pledge tends to promote infidelity in the national heart. The resultant loss of faith in party principles and declarations justifies the thought, growing all too common in this country, that the honeyed phrases of party platforms are indeed nothing more than political molasses to catch human flies.

This charge of dishonorable practice is so succinctly answered in an editorial in the Outlook for October 5, 1912, that I beg to quote a few words therefrom:

What is it that the United States has done? For nearly 400 years the civilized world entertained the idea of a canal through the Isthmus from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Surveys were made, plans were drawn, treaties were enacted. Finally the French people undertook the work. They failed. The American people assumed the burden. They have fought disease and death. They have struggled with engineering problems incredibly difficult. They have laid upon themselves financially an everlasting burden of over $400,000,000. All this has been done not merely for their own benefit, but for the benefit of the entire world. And their final act is to say that the ships of all nations, including their own, engaged in international commerce shall share the benefits of the canal on equal terms. Not only that, they have legally fixed for the ships of the British people (who are now accusing the Americans of dishonorable practices) a rate of toll which is actually insufficient to pay the cost of the maintenance of the canal. Have they (the British) given us in this matter that word of praise which we may be fairly said to deserve? If they have spoken such a word of praise, they certainly have not repeated it often enough to be in danger of overstimulating our vanity.

THE QUESTION OF ARBITRATION.

The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] in his able speech of January 21, 1913, devoted much space to an appeal that the question should be submitted to The Hague court of arbitration. And the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] also argued forcibly in favor of disposing of the matter in that way. But let us see if the matter under discussion is arbitrable. In the treaty with Great Britain of April 4, 1908, it is agreed that all matters in dispute shall be referred to The Hague permanent court of arbitration, except those which "affect the vital interests, the independence, or the honor of the two contracting States, and do not concern the interests of third parties." What reference does the Senator from New York make to these exemptions in his speech? I quote his words:

Of course, the question of the rate of tolls on the Panama Canal does not affect any nation's vital interests. It does not affect the independence or the honor of either of these contracting States. We have a difference relating to the interpretation of this treaty, and that is all there is to it.

The learned Senator thus disposes of the exemptions above quoted, and goes on through many pages to extol the virtues of arbitration. Not a word as to whether the dispute concerns the "interests of third parties." Is it not the contention of those who favor the repeal of the exemption clause that every nation, as well as Great Britain, must be admitted to the canal on the same basis as the United States? Why, then, are there not many "third parties"? This one point, as it seems to me, would render the matter not subject to arbitration. It may seem presumptuous in me to say this, but that is the way I interpret the treaty.

The Senator asserts that the question of the rate of tolls does not "affect any nation's vital interests." Perhaps the mere question of tolls does not, but the principle which underlies this whole matter certainly does. A retreat from our position, in the words of ex-Senator Foraker, not only "means self-condemnation, but it also means the abandonment for all time of a right which in the vicissitudes of our national life may, under changed circumstances, be of value far beyond what we can now realize or appreciate." If the British, quoting further from Mr. Foraker, "are to be allowed to dictate with respect to the use of our canal to the extent now demanded, it will be found the more we yield the more we will have to yield." It is the far-reaching consequences of repeal which affect our "vital interests," and having once submitted to dictation by Great Britain, and established a precedent, no one can prophesy where her demands will end, or what essential rights we will next be called upon to surrender.

Mr. President, we are besought to withdraw from what is styled our "arrogant refusal" to submit the matter to arbitration and to consent to allow the dispute to be adjusted by an "impartial tribunal." It strikes me that it is reasonable to assume that the members of that court representing foreign nations, especially if the suggestion that all the nations of the world except ourselves hold that we are wrong, are necessarily prejudiced against us in advance. Again, I do not know whether the members of the court representing the United States would be admitted to the arbitration or not, or whether they would consent to serve if invited to do so; but it is significant that if they should serve at least two members of the court who will represent the United States have already placed themselves on record as opposed to the exemption of tolls; hence it occurs to me that we would in any event be badly handicapped from the beginning if the matter should be submitted to The Hague court as now constituted, as suggested by the senior Senator from New York. For myself I much prefer the suggestion made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], that the matter might well go to the Supreme Court of the United States for a determination as to the true construction of the treaty. As he ably argued, a decision reached by that court would at least satisfy our own people, while the result of arbitration, if the decision was against us, would presumably leave the matter, so far as our own people are concerned, in the same unsettled condition of mind as now exists.

FOLLOW THE PRESIDENT, "RIGHT OR WRONG!"

The President's appeal to Congress that we should grant him what he asks "in support of the foreign policy of the administration" is echoed by other Senators, who urge that we should give "unreserved support" to the President of the United States in his foreign policies, because he is the President of no party, but of all the people.

But does this bind us to sustain him in every measure he may propose for the placating of foreign Governments? At the outset of his administration the President secured the enactment of a tariff law, radically reducing the duties on American manufactures which come into competition with the products of Europe. Those concessions were supposed to be of enormous value to the European Governments and peoples. It was just such a tariff as foreign nations had long, earnestly, and frankly desired, and criticized and denounced our Government for not adopting.

But this tariff for revenue only, valuable and welcome though it was, has apparently failed to satisfy the greed or to secure the favor or friendship of Great Britain. Still another concession—a higher purchase price—is necessary. It is offered in the repeal of the clause exempting American coastwise ships from paying tolls at Panama.

But suppose that this added concession of ours should fail, as the new tariff has failed, to win the complete good will of Great Britain, what then? That country, as is well known, has been giving generous subsidies to her principal lines of steamships for more than 70 years. She has expended for this purpose not far from $400,000,000. British shipping is now receiving almost $10,000,000 a year in all from the United Kingdom and her colonies. These British subsidies have been a most important factor in upbuilding the vast steam marine of the British Empire and in destroying our own steam marine in foreign trade, which in the early days was far more efficient and successful than the fleet of our great competitor.

Now, suppose that the British Government, believing that the purpose of its own subsidy policy had been achieved by the practical destruction of our over-seas shipping, and dreading lest we might follow her example, should propose to President Wilson, who rejects all subsidies as economically unsound, that Great Britain and America should agree in a formal treaty that no more subsidies should be given by either nation? This would present another question of foreign policy. It would provide another opportunity and another very tempting price whereby to win the approbation and good will of foreign Governments. Would the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who advises us to follow the President, notwithstanding in the Senator's opinion we have a right to exempt our coastwise ships, also hold that we all ought to follow and sustain the President, whether "right or wrong," in that new departure? I apprehend not.

REPEAL OF THE COASTWISE LAWS.

It is a fact of new and profound significance that at the present time, both in this and in the other House of Congress, gentlemen who are following the President have introduced and are apparently pressing for consideration various proposals for the repeal of our historic coastwise legislation, which ever since the early years of the Republic has reserved the great coastwise trade of this country to American ships and American sailors. If this legislation is repealed, foreign ships, with Chinese or Lascar crews, and with their tolls paid in subsidies from foreign Governments, can compete freely with our own ships in the carrying of American merchandise between Boston, New York, New Orleans, and our own ports of the Pacific seaboard. Such a policy would mean, of course, the destruction of what is left of our merchant marine and the utter annihilation of American shipbuilding and navigation.

If the imposing of full tolls upon American ships at Panama should fail, as the reduction of tariff duties upon a billion dollars' worth of foreign manufactured goods has manifestly failed, to produce the desired conciliatory effect upon foreign Governments; and President Wilson, as a further effort in this direction, should recommend to the Congress the immediate consideration and enactment of the legislation proposed by some of his supporters for the repeal of our coastwise laws; and if the President should reiterate his present assurances that this still further concession was absolutely essential to his diplomatic policies, would the Senator from Massachusetts once more urge that the President's word should be supreme in foreign relations, and that party differences should cease at the water's edge? Would the Senator follow the President to this further and complete extinguishment of American maritime interests? Of course he would not; and yet if the President must be upheld in his foreign policy at any price, must he not be upheld in the one case as well as in the other?

FORMER PATRIOTISM IN REGARD TO THE AGGRESSIONS OF ENGLAND.

While the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was under discussion in 1850, Mr. Clayton, the Secretary of State, was subjected to very severe denunciation in the Senate for accepting a treaty which practically provided for a partnership with Great Britain in the construction of the canal, when it was within his power to secure a monopoly for the United States. After he left the Cabinet he sought election to the Senate for the express purpose of replying to his critics. He was successful, and four days after taking his oath as Senator he made a memorable speech defending his course in the negotiation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. His principal critic had been Senator Cass, of Michigan, but at this time Mr. Cass was at home in attendance on his sick wife, so Mr. Clayton addressed his remarks to Senator Stephen A. Douglas, the chief lieutenant of Senator Cass. At the close of Mr. Clayton's remarks Mr. Douglas arose to reply. After hearing the supplications from the present-day leader of the Democratic Party that we ought to placate Great Britain by repealing the tolls exemption provision, it is, indeed, refreshing to listen to some of the patriotic outbursts of the virile head of that party in the days when men spoke their convictions.

Mr. Douglas said:

> Are we under any more obligation to consult European powers about an American question than the allied powers were in their congress to consult us when establishing the equilibrium of Europe by the agency of the Holy Alliance? America was not consulted then. Our name does not appear in any of the proceedings. It was a European question, about which it was presumed America had nothing to say.
> I hope the time has arrived when we will not be told any more that Europe will not consent to this and England will not consent to that. I heard that argument till I got tired of it when we were discussing the resolution for the annexation of Texas. I heard it again on the Oregon question, and I heard it on the California question. It has been said on every occasion whenever we have had an issue about foreign relations that England would not consent, yet she has acquiesced in whatever we have had the courage and the justice to do. And why? Because we kept ourselves in the right.
> I think the time has come when America should perform her duty according to our own judgment and our own sense of justice, without regard to what European powers might say in respect to it. I think this Nation is about of age. I think we have a right to judge for ourselves. Let us always do right and put the consequences behind us.
>
> Sir, the way to establish friendly relations with England is to let her know that we are not so stupid as not to understand her policy nor so pusillanimous as to submit to her aggressions. The moment that she understands that we mean what we say and will carry out any principle we profess, she will be very careful not to create any point of difference between us.

Mr. President, those words were spoken by Stephen A. Douglas, the great leader of the Democratic Party, 61 years ago, when our Government was much weaker and less able to defend herself from the aggressions of foreign powers than she is to-day. They are commended to the Democrats of the present generation. They were brave words from a brave man, who did not allow his judgment to be warped or his utterances to be suppressed through fear of foreign interference. We may well emulate the words of that great leader of his party—known in his day as "the Little Giant"—and stand firmly and unflinchingly for the best interests of the people of the United States, uninfluenced by the views or desires of foreign governments.

In 1810, during the discussion of the bill to repeal the embargo against British shipping, which eventually succeeded, under pressure from England, Henry Clay delivered a notable speech in the Senate, which might well be repeated to-day. I quote a few paragraphs from that speech, which show that patriotism was not lacking in this body in those days in denouncing foreign aggression. Mr. Clay said:

> Sir, is the time never to arrive when we may manage our affairs without the fear of insulting His Britannic Majesty? Is the rod of British power to be forever suspended over our heads? Does Congress put on an embargo to shelter our rightful commerce against the piratical depredations committed upon it on the ocean, we are immediately warned of the indignation of offended England. Is a law of nonintercourse proposed, the whole navy of the haughty mistress of the seas is made to thunder in our ears.
> Does the President refuse to continue a correspondence with a minister who violates the decorum belonging to his diplomatic character, by giving and deliberately repeating an affront to the whole Nation, we are instantly menaced with the chastisement which English pride will not fail to inflict.
> Whether we assert our rights by sea or attempt their maintenance by land, whithersoever we turn ourselves, this phantom incessantly pursues us. Already has it had too much influence on the councils of the Nation. It contributed to the repeal of the embargo—that dishonorable repeal, which has so much tarnished the character of our Government.

The words of Douglas and of Clay reverberated throughout the land when they were uttered, and the American people will indorse equally brave words to-day. England has been a land pirate all through her history. Her diplomacy has been both able and unscrupulous, and if she succeeds in carrying the point now in controversy she will add one more notable victory to her long line of diplomatic triumphs. Can it be possible that the Senate of the United States will aid her in that effort?

Mr. President, a present-day note of patriotism in regard to this matter is sounded by Mrs. Mary Lockwood, the founder of the Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution. I commend her appeal to every true American, man and woman alike, who has at heart the principles upon which this great society was founded. Mrs. Lockwood says:

> The time has come when Americans had best look out for American interests. I appeal to every patriot to stand by his or her country's rights and privileges.

Mr. President, if we are brave enough to do that, the interference of Great Britain in a matter of purely domestic concern to the United States will be rebuked, and we will stand before the world in the light of an independent, self-respecting, courageous Nation, sensitive of our rights, and ready to defend them at all times and under all circumstances.

Mr. President, the great task is completed, and to-day it is expected that a vessel will pass from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean across the Isthmus of Panama. The dreams of ages have been fulfilled, and the canal is open on equal terms to the international commerce of the world. The greatest achievement of modern times immortalizes the genius of America and Americans; and Goethals, Gorgas, and their associates have won imperishable renown, and their names will forever live in the memory of our people. They conquered disease, overcame what seemed to be insuperable engineering problems, and by patience, courage, and unflagging devotion to duty consummated the great enterprise. In a sense the canal belongs to the world, but in a larger and truer sense it belongs to us. To a just share in its privileges and benefits the nations of the earth are invited; but its defense, protection, and maintenance are reserved to the United States. The waters of the two oceans will mingle, and a large share of the commerce of the world will be carried through the great waterway to be distributed to South America, the Orient, and other distant markets; and more and more, as the years come and go, will the incalculable boon that we have bestowed be appreciated. It is for us as a nation to feel just pride in what we have accomplished, and it is equally for us to be jealous of our rights and faithful to the interests of the great Nation we represent. That we can only do by firmly adhering to the legislation now on the statute books and resisting all efforts, from whatever source they may come, to induce us to yield the superior rights that we have fairly won and the superior recognition that is manifestly our due. Let us in dealing with this question adopt the words of Jefferson in his communication to the American commissioners at Madrid:

> We confide in our strength without boasting of it; we respect that of others without fearing it.

THE TRADITIONAL POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES IN RELATION TO WATERWAYS.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, in support of the bill to repeal the exemption of our coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls in the Panama Canal three classes of arguments have been earnestly and ably presented to the Senate.

First. That the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 requires entire equality among nations, and consequently the exemption of any shipping of the United States is a violation of its provisions. It is further argued that even if the treaty in itself does not forbid discrimination, at least when negotiations and treaties made before and after are considered with it, the inhibition is absolutely conclusive.

Second. The economic argument that the exemption from payment of tolls constitutes a subsidy, and that is not justified by our laws, is contrary to the spirit of our institutions, and is opposed by the party in power and by many adherents of the Republican Party. In this connection it is maintained that the exemption will not materially benefit producer or consumer or aid in reducing rates on transcontinental railroads.

Third. The opinion of other nations. It is alleged that this opinion is practically unanimous against us. The President, in his brief and forcible message, while regarding the exemption as a mistaken economic policy from every point of view and in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain, adds: "The meaning of the treaty is not debated outside of the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption." He also gives an intimation of "matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence" with which he will have difficulty in dealing unless the exemption act is repealed.

The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts has aptly expressed this argument in quoting from the Declaration of Independence the words, "a decent respect for the opinions of mankind," to which he added, "and the high position of the United States among the nations of the world."

But in addition to these three, there is still a further argument equally potent in favor of repeal, and that is the traditional and practically uniform policy of the United States in advocating—yes, demanding—the free and equal use of navigable channels or waterways. Our policy in this regard is as near to being invariable as upon any important national question. It is much more constant than our record as regards the relation of the Federal Government to the States or upon tariff or foreign affairs.

Nations, like individuals, have their distinctive qualities, opinions, and aspirations which shape their course and determine their standing among the countries of the world. Thus their movements may be forward or backward. They may advance the cause of human liberty or retard its development. They may promote international confidence or breed discord and repulsion.

German idealism has given to nations the attribute of personality. The great Swiss-German publicist, Bluntschli, says:

> Individual States differ like individual men in spirit, character, and form. * * * While history explains the organic nature of the State, we learn from it at the same time that the State does not stand on the same grade with the lower organisms of plants and animals, but is of a higher kind; we learn that it is a moral and spiritual organism, a great body which is capable of taking up into itself the feelings and thoughts of the nation of uttering them in laws, and realizing them in acts; we are informed of moral qualities and of the character of each State. History ascribes to the State a personality which, having spirit and body, possesses and manifests a will of its own. * * *
> The recognition of the personality of the State is thus not less indispensable for public law (Statsrecht) than for international law (Volkerrecht).

The United States from the very beginning insisted upon certain fundamental principles, such as that all men are created equal; that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. The basis of the demand for equal use of channels is found in the essential ideas which actuated the American Revolution. Liberty and equality of rights demanded as a concomitant equality of opportunity and unrestricted progress. Progress and equality of opportunity require common access to those utilities and agencies which are necessary for the use and benefit of mankind.

Thus we see that from the very first our ancestors strenuously insisted upon the abolition of exactions and the removal of restrictions which royal privilege had imposed or which had been accepted as belonging to countries because of favorable location or other advantages. Many of the colonists prior to the Revolution had been actively engaged in trade and in commerce by sea. One of the accusations against King George III in the Declaration of Independence is "for cutting off our trade with all parts of the world."

In the report of the committee of the Continental Congress, in response to the conciliatory resolution proffered by Lord North in 1775, complaint was made that freedom of movement had been denied to the ships of the colonies. The report, submitted to Congress on July 25, 1775, is in the following language:

> On the contrary, to show they mean no discontinuance of injury, they pass acts, at the very time of holding out this proposition, for restraining the commerce and fisheries of the province of New England, and for interdicting the trade of other colonies with all foreign nations and with each other. This proves unequivocally they mean not to relinquish the exercise of indiscriminate legislation over us.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF CLAIM OF NATURAL RIGHTS IN NAVIGABLE STREAMS.

This claim of a natural right was asserted by the Continental Congress during the Revolutionary War in a demand made upon Spain for the free navigation of the Mississippi River. The domain of Spain then extended along the westerly bank of the Mississippi and on the easterly bank from the mouth to the present northerly boundary of the State of Louisiana, parallel 31 of north latitude. On the 6th of August, in the year 1779, the minister of the United States, Mr. John Jay, was authorized, by resolution—to conclude with France and Spain a treaty or treaties, offensive or defensive, in which offensive or defensive treaty nevertheless you shall insert on the part of your State a proper article or articles for obtaining the free navigation of the River Mississippi.

The following month a similar resolution was passed and made the basis for instructions to Mr. Jay. The inability to agree on this subject prevented the making of a treaty. Notwithstanding the earnest desire for a treaty of friendship and alliance with Spain, the Members of the Continental Congress refused to enter into any engagement, however favorable, unless the free navigation of the Mississippi was assured.

On the 2d of October, 1780, Benjamin Franklin, in writing a letter to Mr. Jay, said:

Poor as we are, yet as I know we shall be rich, I would rather agree with them (Spain) to buy at a great price the whole of their right on the Mississippi than sell a drop of its waters. A neighbor might as well ask me to sell my street door.

As the war was protracted and the success of the colonies became less promising, the Congress became less insistent. It seems to have been the opinion that the river had been used by the United States without trouble with Spain, and there was no reason to fear that the friendly disposition between the two nations would be interrupted. The minister was authorized, in 1781, if he could not obtain the desired concession, to recede from it. No final agreement, however, was entered into, and the question was left open until the matter was again taken up by Mr. Jefferson in the year 1792, to which I shall make reference later.

The next manifestation of this policy was before the adoption of the Federal Constitution. In the negotiations for the preliminary treaty of 1782 with Great Britain, October 8, 1782, Benjamin Franklin and John Jay, commissioners on behalf of the United States, submitted a draft, which contained the following provision:

Fourthly, That the navigation of the River Mississippi from its source to the ocean shall forever remain free and open, and that both there and in all rivers, harbors, lakes, ports, and places belonging to His Britannic Majesty or to the United States, or in any part of the world, the merchants and merchant ships of the one and the other shall be received, treated, and protected like the merchants and merchant ships of the sovereign of the country. That is to say, the British merchants and merchant ships, on the one hand, shall enjoy in the United States and in all places belonging to them the same protection and commercial privileges and be liable only to the same charges and duties as their own merchants and merchant ships; and, on the other hand, the merchants and merchant ships of the United States shall enjoy in all places belonging to His Britannic Majesty the same protection and commercial privileges and be liable only to the same charges and duties of British merchants and merchant ships, saving always to the chartered trading companies of Great Britain such exclusive use and trade and their respective posts and establishments as neither the subjects of Great Britain nor any of the more favored nations participate in.

This was refused.

On April 29, 1783, the American commissioners presented to Mr. Hartley, the British commissioner, an article for the proposed final treaty giving equal rights to both nations in the navigable waters of each. It was in the following language:

All rivers, harbors, lakes, ports, and places belonging to the United States, or any of them, shall be open and free to the merchants and other subjects of the Crown of Great Britain and their trading vessels, who shall be received, treated, and protected like the merchants and trading vessels of the States in which they may be and be liable to no other charges or duties

And, reciprocally, all rivers, harbors, lakes, ports, and places under the dominion of His Britannic Majesty shall thenceforth be open and free to the merchant trading vessels of the said United States, and of each and every of them, who shall be received, treated, and protected like the merchants and trading vessels of Great Britain and be liable to no other charges and duties, saving always to the chartered trading companies of Great Britain such exclusive use and trade of their respective ports and establishments as neither the other subjects of Great Britain nor any of the most favored nations participate in.

It will thus be seen that a new and advanced principle with reference to freedom of navigation—that of entire equality in the use of both national and international waters—was presented by these eminent patriots, all of whom were so prominent in the early days of this Republic and had so much to do in shaping our institutions and policies.

May 21, 1783, Mr. Hartley made a counter proposition, which only gave equality in import and export duties to the ships of both countries.

The reason why the offer of the American commissioners was not accepted is set forth very fully in the reply of Mr. Hartley, the British commissioner, of May 21, 1783:

A proposition having been offered by the American ministers for the consideration of His Britannic Majesty's ministers and of the British nation for an entire and reciprocal freedom of intercourse and commerce between Great Britain and the American United States in the following words—

Then follows the article suggested by the American commissioners of April 29, 1783, given above:

It is to be observed that this proposition implies a more ample participation of British commerce than the American States possessed even under their former connection of dependence upon Great Britain, so as to amount to an entire abolition of the British act of navigation in respect to the 13 United States of America, and although proceeding on their part from the most conciliatory and liberal principles of amity and reciprocity, nevertheless it comes from them as newly established States, and who, in consequence of their former condition of dependence, have never yet had any established system of national commercial laws, or of commercial connections by treaties with other nations, free and unembarrassed of many weighty considerations, which require the most scrupulous attention and investigation on the part of Great Britain, whose ancient system of national and commercial policy is thus suddenly called upon to take a new principle for its foundation, and whose commercial engagements with other ancient States may be most materially affected thereby. For the purpose, therefore, of giving sufficient time for the consideration and discussion of so important a proposition respecting the present established system of the commercial laws and policy of Great Britain and their subsisting commercial engagements with foreign powers, it is proposed that a temporary intercourse of commerce shall be established between Great Britain and the American States previously to the conclusion of any final and perpetual compact. In this intervening period, as the strict line and measure of reciprocity, from various circumstances, can not be absolutely and completely adhered to, it may be agreed that the commerce between the two countries shall revive, as nearly as can be, upon the same footing and terms as formerly subsisted between them, provided always that no concession on either side in the proposed temporary convention shall be argued hereafter in support of any future demand or claim. In the meantime the proposition above stated may be transmitted to London, requesting (with His Majesty's consent) that it may be laid before Parliament for their consideration. * * * With regard to the West Indies, there is no objection to the most free intercourse between them and the United States. The only restriction proposed to be laid upon that intercourse is prohibiting American ships carrying to those colonies any other merchandise than the produce of their own country. The same observation may be made upon this restriction as upon the former. It is not meant to affect the interests of the United States, but it is highly necessary, lest foreign ships should make use of the American flag to carry on a trade with the British West India Islands.

It is also proposed, upon the same principle, to restrain the ships that may trade to Great Britain from America from bringing foreign merchandise into Great Britain. The necessity of this restriction is likewise evident, unless Great Britain meant to give up the whole navigation act. There is no necessity for any similar restrictions on the part of the American States, those States not having as yet any acts of navigation.

In view of the insistence of Great Britain, the American commissioners were compelled to yield their contention.

The treaty was signed at Paris, September 3, 1783, by John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, and John Jay on behalf of the United States, and by Mr. Hartley for Great Britain.

Article 8 is the only one which refers to navigation. It is as follows:

The navigation of the River Mississippi from its source to its mouth shall forever remain free and open to the subjects of Great Britain and the citizens of the United States.

As regards the refusal to grant reciprocal use of channels, Mr. John Adams, in his diary for Monday, May 19, 1783, volume 3 of his collected works, page 269, says:

Mr. Hartley informed us to-day that the King's council had not agreed to our proposition of putting Britons upon the footing of Americans in all American ports, rivers, etc., and Americans on the footing of Britons in all British ports, rivers, etc. He says he is sorry for this, because he thinks it just and politic, and he shall ever be in Parliament for bringing things to this point.

At a later time the question of the navigation of that portion of the Mississippi River flowing through the territory belonging to Spain was again raised. Mr. Jefferson, then Secretary of State, claimed the right to equal navigation by boats of the United States as a natural right, and in his report in 1792 on negotiations with Spain regarding a treaty relative to the navigation of the Mississippi River he said:

If we appeal to this as we feel it written in the heart of man, what sentiment is written in deeper characters than that the ocean is free to all men and the rivers to all their inhabitants? Is there a man, savage or civilized, unbiased by habit, who does not feel and attest this truth? Accordingly, in all tracts of country united under the same political society we find this natural right universally acknowledged and protected by laying the navigable rivers open to all their inhabitants. When their rivers enter the limits of another society, if the right of the upper inhabitants to descend the stream is in any case obstructed, it is an act of force by a stronger society against a weaker, condemned by the judgment of mankind.

In a treaty framed in 1795 equal use of the Mississippi River was provided for both nations in the portions flowing through territory belonging to Spain south of the thirty-first parallel of north latitude; also in that part which served as the western boundary of the United States. This treaty was ratified in the year 1796, during the administration of President Washington. In the following decade Madison, then Secretary of State under President Jefferson, made the same claim with reference to streams east of the Mississippi passing from the United States through the Floridas.

In a letter dated March 2, 1803, addressed to Messrs. Livingston and Monroe, our representatives in France, he says:

The United States have a just claim to the use of the rivers which pass from their territory through the Floridas. They found their claims on like principles with those which supported their claims for the use of the Mississippi.

For a long time prior to the beginning of the nineteenth century the Barbary States had been imposing tribute upon vessels passing through the Strait of Gibraltar. Their location made it easy for them, by piratical excursions, to capture merchantmen passing to and from the Mediterranean, and in settlement specific amounts were agreed upon. One singular feature of this situation was that Great Britain gained an advantage from the conditions existing, as her subjects were able to pay $200,000 annually in the way of tribute, while the other countries were unable to meet the demands. Our trade with Mediterranean ports was very considerable. Our shipping had been subjected to these exactions and payments had been made in the form of ransoms for prisoners taken, presents, and otherwise. The amount of these payments, according to a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, amounted to $2,046,000, July 30, 1802. We demanded that our ships have free access to the Mediterranean without the payment of tribute, and engaged in a naval war which, in the heroism displayed, is one of the most notable pages in the history of the American Navy. Our contention for the free use of this strait and for undisturbed navigation of the Mediterranean was conceded by the Barbary States. The courageous stand of this Republic for the rights of our shipping and for the freedom of commerce inured to the benefit of all the commercial nations of the globe.

In the meantime the right of free and equal navigation of international rivers and waterways began to be asserted in Europe. This right had been maintained by the Romans and was affirmed in the institutes of Justinian, but was generally denied after the ninth century. Although Grotius had maintained the principle of equal use of rivers, a contrary view prevailed in Europe until the French Revolution. The French Republic sought to open the Rhine and other rivers to the free navigation of nations bordering upon it.

The treaty of Paris, May 30, 1814, after the fall of Napoleon, went much further, and laid down the rule of free navigation not solely for bordering States but for all States. This rule was definitely established for the Rhine, and the treaty provided that in a future congress the general principle should be considered of extending the same rule to all other streams which in their navigable course separated or traversed different states.

At the congress of Vienna, in the following year, articles 108 to 116, the general principle was laid down. On the 3d of May, 1815, a treaty between Austria and Russia declared the navigation of the rivers and canals of the ancient Kingdom of Poland to be free, so as not to be interdicted by any inhabitant of the Polish Provinces subject to either the Russian or Austrian Governments. There was a similar treaty between Russia and Prussia touching the waterways of Poland. In 1815 and 1821 treaties were entered into between Prussia and other States relating to the navigation of the Elbe. In 1856 the countries bordering on the Danube provided for freedom of navigation upon it. Similar treaties were entered into in regard to the Po between Austria and two States of Italy. The river Douro, by a treaty between Portugal and Spain of August 31, 1835, was declared to be free. The treaty of Berlin, in 1885, proclaimed the principle of liberty and equality in the largest degree for the Kongo and the Niger, expressly extending the agreement not merely to rivers, large and small, but to lakes, the canals connecting them, and still further, to highways and railways connecting with these waterways.

The settled contention of the United States was again maintained during the administration of President Monroe. The administration in 1823 began negotiations with Great Britain relative to the right of inhabitants of the United States to navigate the St. Lawrence. It was stated that this right had never been discussed with Great Britain, but was referred to as one which might be established upon the "general principles of the law of nature." Mr. Adams, the Secretary of State, in his instructions to our embassy at London, declared the United States bound to maintain for its people in Michigan, Illinois, and so forth, "the natural right of communicating with the ocean by the only outlet provided by nature from the waters bordering upon their shores." He admitted that possession of both shores and the mouth had been held to give the right of obstructing or interdicting navigation to the people of other nations, but claimed that the river was "a right of nature preceding it in point of time and which the sovereign right of one nation can not annihilate as belonging to the people of another." He cited the acts of the congress of Vienna declaring navigation of various rivers "free to all nations." Great Britain, however, was willing to treat the claim as a concession for which an equivalent must be obtained.

Under the reciprocal treaty of 1854, terminated March 17, 1866, the right of reciprocal navigation of the St. Lawrence was granted and in return therefor Lake Michigan was opened to British subjects, together with an engagement on the part of our Government to urge upon the State governments the use of several State canals on terms of equality. The treaty of 1871 again gave the right of navigating the St. Lawrence and the Canadian canals, and the British subjects were given a like right to the use of American canals. These rights were confirmed in the more recent treaty of 1909–10 relating to boundary waters between the United States and Canada.

The United States was the country most insistent upon exemption from tolls charged by the Danish Government on vessels and cargoes passing through the sound and the two belts which form a passage from the North Sea into the Baltic. These tolls had been imposed on the ground of immemorial usage, beginning in the fourteenth century and sanctioned by a long succession of treaties. The passage through the strait was aided by lights upon Danish territory, and the course of vessels was within cannon shot of land owned by Denmark on both sides.

Under a treaty concluded in 1826 the United States received for its vessels and their cargoes the most-favored-nation treatment under a provision that our ships should not pay higher or other duties than those paid by other countries; but in the year 1844, under the administration of President Tyler, Mr. Calhoun, then Secretary of State, maintained that Denmark had no right to levy duties on vessels passing through the sound from the North Sea to the Baltic, that such a charge was contrary to the public law of nations under which the navigation of the two seas connected by the straits should be free to all nations and therefore the navigation of the channel by which they are connected ought also to be free. He maintained that the foundation of the claim was made in a "remote and barbarous age, even before the discovery of America." It appears that in a preceding period of 16 years, 1828 to 1843, both inclusive, the average annual amount collected from American shipping was $107,467.71, and in addition there were other charges for "light money," and so forth. The amount of the tonnage of American ships going through the sound during a year was about 21,000 tons, both going and returning. Negotiations continued for a considerable time and in the year 1857 a treaty was framed under which the navigation of the sound and belts was declared free to American vessels on payment of $393,000.

There has been much diplomatic correspondence in regard to rivers in South America. Most of the countries in that continent have shown a liberal policy in opening their rivers to navigation for the merchant vessels of all nations. A decree to that effect was issued by the Argentine Confederation on the 3d of October, 1852, relating to the Rivers Parana and Uruguay. Mr. Secretary Clayton, in 1850, stated that the Department of State had for some time past in contemplation measures for procuring for the citizens of the United States the navigation of the River Amazon and some of its tributaries.

Bolivia, in 1853, declared its navigable waters free to the commerce and navigation of all nations of the globe. Brazil for a time opposed, and Secretary Marcy, under President Pierce's administration, sought the removal of restrictions upon the navigation of the Amazon. In a letter to our minister to Brazil he said:

> The most important object of your mission, an object to which you will devote your early and earnest efforts, is to secure to the citizens of the United States the free use of the Amazon. * * * The restricted policy, which it is understood Brazil still persists in maintaining in regard to navigable rivers passing through her territory, is the relic of an age less enlightened than the present. * * * You are instructed to claim for our citizens the use of this natural avenue of trade. This right is not derived from treaty stipulations. It is a natural one, as much so as that to navigate the ocean, the common highway of nations.

A treaty was framed by Bolivia in 1858 in which that State declared the River Amazon and the River La Plata, with their tributaries, to be highways or channels opened by nature to the commerce of all nations. The Government of Brazil, by a decree of December 7, 1866, opened the navigation of the Amazon to the vessels of all nations from September 7, 1867. In 1868 the President of Peru issued a decree declaring the navigation of all the rivers of that Republic open to merchant vessels, whatever their nationality.

In the year 1878 it was reported to the State Department that the Argentine Republic and Chile were proposing to exclude foreign ships from free passage through the Straits of Magellan. On this subject Mr. Secretary Evarts wrote to our minister, Mr. Osborn, on the 18th of January, 1879:

> The Government of the United States will not tolerate exclusive claim by any nation whatsoever to the Straits of Magellan and will hold responsible any government that undertakes, no matter on what pretext, to lay any impost or check on United States commerce through these straits.

Other countries protested also, and as a result a treaty was entered into between the Argentine Republic and Chile on the 13th of June, 1888, which provides in article 15 that—

The Magellan Straits are neutralized forever and free navigation is guaranteed to the flags of all nations. To insure this neutrality no fortifications or military defenses shall be created that could interfere with this object.

I have not by any means given all the instances in which, by diplomatic correspondence or otherwise, the United States has insisted upon the free and equal use of navigable channels, nor have we refused to grant the same privilege to other nations. In the year 1871 equality was granted in the Yukon, the Porcupine, and the Stikine Rivers, flowing from the British possessions into Alaska. The foregoing, however, show a uniform policy, to which there have been but insignificant exceptions. For example, prior to the abolition of tolls on the Erie Canal in the year 1882 the State of New York imposed higher charges in the canal upon salt mined in Canada than upon that mined in the State of New York. This was a protective measure of a very drastic character, and was actuated, no doubt, by the fact that the State of New York owned salt mines near Syracuse. The correspondence of Mr. Blaine in regard to a closed sea in the neighborhood of the Pribilof Islands is another apparent exception.

The stand taken at that time was due to the very exceptional conditions existing.

In the treaty of cession of Alaska the boundary line was a long distance from the shore, and for the preservation of the seal herds on the islands it was thought essential to control a large section of the sea outside of the 3-mile limit because of the habits of the seal. Our contention in this regard was submitted to arbitration and the decision was unfavorable to the United States. In 1892 Secretary of State Foster maintained that the Hudson River was exclusively a national stream, and that the natural right of navigation did not exist. It must be said that this latter contention is not altogether in line with our general policy.

This opinion was in response to a claim on the part of Canada of the right to send boats from the Champlain Canal down the Hudson to its mouth. Canada gave our refusal to accept this claim as a reason for the discriminatory regulations in regard to the Welland Canal and other waters, which gave rise to the controversy of 1888–1892.

DECLARATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES MADE IN CONTEMPLATION OF THE CONSTRUCTION OF AN ISTHMIAN CANAL.

It is not necessary for us to rely upon precedents of a general nature. The most conclusive proof of the policy of the United States is to be found in the action of this Senate, the House, and of Presidents and Secretaries of State in relation to the very project under consideration, namely, the construction of an isthmian canal connecting the Caribbean Sea with the Pacific Ocean. The intention to make this artificial waterway open to all nations on terms of entire equality has been manifested in the most unequivocal language, not only by the executive and legislative departments of the Government but by men of all political parties, Democratic, Whig, and Republican, and that, too, in the life of almost every administration which has had this subject under consideration during nearly 90 years. There has been hardly a dissenting note in all this period except in the act of 1912.

After independence had been achieved by the Central and South American Republics it was proposed to hold a conference on the Isthmus of Panama. Messrs. Anderson and Sergeant were chosen delegates to this proposed gathering, though they were unable to attend. Instructions were framed for them by Henry Clay, then Secretary of State under John Quincy Adams. Mr. Clay was so proud of these instructions that when, in his declining years, his friends proposed to prepare a medal in commemoration of his political career, he chose the words "Panama instructions" for one inscription upon this medal as commemorating one of the most notable acts of his whole life. The following is the direction which he gave to the delegates, Messrs. Anderson and Sergeant, in regard to a proposed canal:

A cut or a canal for purposes of navigation somewhere through the Isthmus that connects the two Americas to unite the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans will form a proper subject of consideration at the congress. That vast object, if it should be ever accomplished, will be interesting in a greater or less degree to all parts of the world. But to this continent will probably accrue the largest amount of benefit from its execution, and to Colombia, Mexico, the Central Republics, Peru, and the United States more than to any other of the American nations. What is to redound to the advantage of all America should be effected by common means and united exertions and should not be left to the separate and unassisted efforts of any one power. * * * If the work should ever be executed so as to admit of the passage of sea vessels from ocean to ocean, the benefits of it ought not to be exclusively appropriated to any one nation, but should be extended to all parts of the globe upon the payment of a just compensation or reasonable tolls.

It is well to notice in this connection that the fear the Monroe doctrine may be interfered with by granting equal rights as to tolls on ships passing through the Panama Canal must be without foundation. John Quincy Adams, as Secretary of State in the Cabinet of President Monroe, had been most prominent in formulating the principles which constituted the so-called Monroe doctrine. Barely four years later, after he had become President, his Secretary of State, undoubtedly with his approval, wrote instructions to the effect that the benefits of the proposed canal ought not to be exclusively appropriated to any one nation, but should be extended to all parts of the globe.

In the year 1835, during the administration of President Jackson, the Senate of the United States unanimously adopted a resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to consider the expediency of opening negotiations with the Governments of other nations, and particularly with the Governments of Central America and New Granada, for the purpose of effectually protecting, by suitable treaty stipulations with them, such individuals or companies as may undertake to open a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the construction of a ship canal across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and of securing forever by such stipulations the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all such nations on the payment of such reasonable tolls as may be established to compensate the capitalists who may engage in such undertaking and complete the work.

Mr. Charles Biddle was appointed in pursuance of this resolution by President Jackson and obtained from the Government of New Granada an exclusive grant to the citizens of the United States to construct a canal. Mr. Biddle's action was expressly disavowed.

During the administration of President Van Buren, in a report to the House of Representatives March 2, 1839, Mr. Mercer, of Virginia, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, stated:

The policy is not less apparent which would prompt the United States to cooperate in this enterprise, liberally and efficiently, before other disposition may be awakened in the particular State within whose territory it may be ceded or other nations shall seek by negotiations to engross a commerce which is now and should ever continue open to all.

In the same year the House of Representatives by unanimous vote adopted a resolution much the same as that of the Senate in 1835, requesting the President—to consider the expediency of opening or continuing negotiations with the Governments of other nations, and particularly with those the territorial jurisdiction of which comprehends the Isthmus of Panama, and to which the United States have accredited ministers or agents, for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of effecting a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus and of securing forever by suitable treaty stipulations the free and equal right of navigating such canal by all nations.

In a letter to Mr. Buchanan, Secretary of State, on December 17, 1845, the commissioner accredited to examine a canal route said:

Like all other international questions, it can only be satisfactorily adjusted by concert with the other maritime powers which have similar interests, more or less important, and whose assent is necessary to place the proposed passage under the protection and guaranty of the public law, recognized by the whole world.

On the conclusion of the treaty with New Granada in 1846 President Polk submitted it to the Senate with a message, in which he said:

In entering into the mutual guaranties proposed by the thirty-fifth article neither the Government of New Granada nor that of the United States has a narrow or exclusive view. The ultimate object, as presented by the Senate of the United States in their resolution (Mar. 3, 1835), to which I have already referred, is to secure to all nations the free and equal right of passage over the Isthmus.

In the meantime conditions had arisen which had an important bearing upon the question of an isthmian canal. In the year 1846 our forces had taken possession of California, and it was evident a great area fronting on the Pacific coast would be annexed to the United States. Communication with California was regarded as a matter of immediate and pressing importance, especially as the route overland was exceedingly difficult. The desire for a canal was naturally very much intensified. The treaty with New Granada, which provided for a route across the Isthmus, was concluded in December, 1846, but was not ratified by the Senate until June 3, 1848. In the meantime the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo had been ratified, and California was an assured portion of the United States.

In the consideration of routes the Nicaraguan route had gained in favor in comparison with the route across the Isthmus of Panama. The situation which confronted us was that England had possession of that part of the coast of Nicaragua and Costa Rica in which lay the Atlantic terminus of the proposed route through Nicaragua; also Great Britain maintained a naval squadron in the West Indies, and then, as now, possessed important islands. All these circumstances gave her a great advantage in any plan for a route between the two oceans. Thus it was not Great Britain but the United States which at that time was endeavoring to secure absolute neutrality and equality for the isthmian route.

From the beginning our traditional policy had favored no discrimination in the enjoyment of straits, canals, and rivers, and in this particular instance our interests reenforced that traditional policy. Negotiations from this time on can not be understood without taking into account the desire to obtain under manifest disadvantages equality of treatment in any route across the Isthmus.

In the next administration, that of President Taylor, our Secretary of State, Mr. Clayton, opened negotiations with Great Britain with a view to adjusting the differences between the two countries, Mr. Rives, our minister to France, being appointed to submit the views of the United States to Lord Palmerston. Mr. Rives, in his letter to Secretary Clayton of September 25, 1849, describes his interview with Lord Palmerston and states that in pursuance of his instructions he had said to him:

That the United States, moreover, as one of the principal commercial powers of the world, and the one nearest to the scene of the proposed communication, and holding, besides, a large domain on the western coast of America, had a special, deep, and national interest in the free and unobstructed use, in common with other powers, of any channel of intercourse which might be opened from the one sea to the other; * * * *that the United States sought no exclusive privilege or preferential right of any kind in regard to the proposed communication, and their sincere wish, if it should be found practicable, was to see it dedicated to the common use of all nations on the most liberal terms and a footing of perfect equality for all; * * * that the United States would not, if they could, obtain any exclusive right or privilege in a great highway which naturally belonged to all mankind.* * *

President Taylor in his first annual message to Congress, December 4, 1849, said:

* * * All States entering into such a treaty will enjoy the right of passage through the canal on payment of the same tolls. The work, if constructed under these guaranties, will become a bond of peace instead of a subject of contention and strife between the nations of the earth. Should the great maritime States of Europe consent to this arrangement (and we have no reason to suppose that a proposition so fair and honorable will be opposed by any), the energies of their people and ours will cooperate in promoting the success of the enterprise. * * * Should such a work be constructed under the common protection of all nations, for equal benefit to all, it would be neither just nor expedient that any great maritime State should command the communication. The territory through which the canal may be opened ought to be freed from the claims of any foreign power. No such power should occupy a position that would enable it hereafter to exercise so controlling an influence over the commerce of the world or to obstruct a highway which ought to be dedicated to the common use of mankind.

In a letter to Lord Napier, the British minister, September 10, 1857, Mr. Lewis Cass, Secretary of State under President Buchanan, said:

While the rights of sovereignty of the local governments must always be respected, other rights also have arisen in the progress of events involving interests of great magnitude to the commercial world and demanding its careful attention and, if need be, its efficient protection. In view of these interests and after having invited capital and enterprise from other countries to aid in the opening of these great highways of nations under pledges of free transit to all desiring it, it can not be permitted that these Governments should exercise over them an arbitrary and unlimited control or close them or embarrass them without reference to the wants of commerce or of the intercourse of the world. Equally disastrous would it be to leave them at the mercy of every nation which in time of war might find it advantageous for hostile purposes to take possession of them and either restrain their use or suspend it altogether.

The President hopes, by the general consent of the maritime powers, all such difficulties may be prevented and the interoceanic lines, with the harbors of immediate approach to them, may be secured beyond interruption to the great purposes for which they were established.

In 1862 there was a disturbance upon the Isthmus of Panama which we were called upon to pacify. The note of Mr. Seward, then Secretary of State under President Lincoln, to Mr. Adams is particularly significant, because by the treaty of 1846–1848 with New Granada we had absolutely equal privileges with that country in traffic across the Isthmus. Further, an obligation rested upon us by the same treaty, article 35, to maintain order there, yet Mr. Seward claimed no special privileges for the United States. In his note to Mr. Adams, our minister to London, he said, in speaking of the disturbances which had occurred:

This Government has no interest in the matter different from that of other maritime powers. It is willing to interpose its aid in execution of its treaty and further equal benefit of all nations.

And again, during the term of President Johnson, under date of January 18, 1869, Secretary Seward expressed himself in the same manner.

In the administration of President Grant, Secretary Fish wrote:

* * * A Darien Canal should not be regarded as hostile to a Suez Canal; they will not be so much rivals as joint contributors to the increase of the commerce of the world, and thus mutually advance each other's interests. * * * We shall * * * be glad of any movement which shall result in the early decision of the question of the most practicable route and the early commencement and speedy completion of an interoceanic communication which shall be guaranteed in its perpetual neutralization and dedication to the commerce of all nations, without advantages to one over another of those who guarantee its assured neutrality. * * *

* * * the benefit of neutral waters at the ends thereof for all classes of vessels entitled to fly their respective flags, with the cargoes on board, on equal terms in every respect as between each other.

About the year 1880 the opinion became prevalent that whatever canal might be constructed should be under the exclusive supervision and protection of our own country. This view was maintained by President Hayes. An attempt was made soon after to repudiate the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Notwithstanding this change of opinion, equality among nations was promised by us as distinctly as theretofore.

Secretary Blaine, Secretary of State under the administration of President Garfield, in 1881, in two letters gave the following instructions to Mr. Lowell, our minister to England:

First, that of June 24, 1881:

Nor, in time of peace, does the United States seek to have any exclusive privileges accorded to American ships in respect to precedence or tolls, through an interoceanic canal any more than it has sought like privileges for American goods in transit over the Panama Railway, under the exclusive control of an American corporation. The extent of the privileges of American citizens and ships is measurable under the treaty of 1846 by those of Colombian citizens and ships. It would be our earnest desire and expectation to see the world's peaceful commerce enjoy the same just, liberal, and rational treatment.

It should be noted that at that time the Panama Railway, an American corporation, was available for the commerce of all nations, without any discrimination whatever. Mr. Blaine proposes that the policy of the United States in regard to tolls shall be the same as that of the Panama Railway, which charged equal rates for all.

Second, that of November 19, 1881:

In assuming as a necessity the political control of whatever canal or canals may be constructed across the Isthmus, the United States will act in an entire harmony with the Governments within whose territory the canals should be located. Between the United States and the other American Republics there can be no hostility, no jealousy, no rivalry, no distrust. This Government entertains no design in connection with this project for its advantage which is not also for the equal or greater advantage of the country to be directly and immediately affected; nor does the United States seek any exclusive or narrow commercial advantage. It frankly agrees, and will by public proclamation declare at the proper time, in conjunction with the Republic on whose soil the canal may be located, that the same rights and privileges, the same tolls and obligations for the use of the canal shall apply with absolute impartiality to the merchant marine of every nation on the globe and equally, in the time of peace, the harmless use of the canal shall be freely granted to the war vessels of other nations.

Lord Granville replied as follows:

* * * such communication concerned not merely the United States or the American Continent, but, as was recognized by article 6 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the whole civilized world, and that she would not oppose or decline any discussion for the purpose of securing on a general international basis its universal and unrestricted use. * * *

President Cleveland, in his first annual message to Congress, said:

* * * Whatever highway may be constructed across the barrier dividing the two greatest maritime areas of the world must be for the world's benefit—a trust for mankind, to be removed from the chance of domination by any single power, nor become a point of invitation for hostilities or a prize for warlike ambition. * * * These suggestions may serve to emphasize what I have already said on the score of the necessity of a neutralization of any interoceanic transit; and this can only be accomplished by making the uses of the route open to all nations and subject to the ambitions and warlike necessities of none.

In the second administration of President Cleveland Secretary of State Olney made the following memorandum:

* * * That the interoceanic routes there specified should, under the sovereignty of the States traversed by them, be neutral and free to all nations alike. * * *

Then, in speaking of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, he said:

* * * Under the circumstances, upon every principle which governs the relations to each other, either by nations or of individuals, the United States is completely estopped from denying that the treaty is in full force and vigor.

It may be said that most of the above declarations were made when it was anticipated that the canal would be built by private capital. While no possible reason can exist for a change in the principles applicable in case the canal should be built by our Government, the following declarations were made after the time when it was contemplated that the United States should build and operate the canal.

There was no more decisive note in favor of neutrality and equality than that uttered by Senator Davis, then chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and announced after it was decided that the building and operation of the canal should be a national enterprise. The whole of his report should be read, but the following are pertinent portions:

In the origin of our claim to the right of way for our people and our produce, armies, mails, and other property through the canal, we offer to dedicate the canal to the equal use of mankind. As to neutrality and the exclusive control of the canal and its dedication to universal use, the suggestions that were incorporated in the Clayton-

Bulwer treaty came from the United States and were concurred in by Great Britain. In no instance has the Government of the United States intimated an objection to this treaty on account of the features of neutrality, its equal and impartial use by all other nations. * * * No American statesman, speaking with official authority or responsibility, has ever intimated that the United States would attempt to control this canal for the exclusive benefit of our Government or people. They have all, with one accord, declared that the canal was to be neutral ground in time of war, and always open on terms of impartial equity to the ships and commerce of the world. * * * The United States can not take an attitude of opposition to the principles of the great act of October 22, 1888, without discrediting the official declarations of our Government for 50 years on the neutrality of an Isthmian Canal, and its equal use by all nations without discrimination. To set up the selfish motive of gain by establishing a monopoly of a highway that must derive its income from the patronage of all maritime countries would be unworthy of the United States if we owned the country through which the canal is to be built. * * * The Suez Canal makes no discrimination in its tolls in favor of its stockholders; and, taking its profits, or the half of them, as our basis of calculation, we will never find it necessary to differentiate our rates of toll in favor of our own people in order to secure a very great profit on the investment.

President Roosevelt, in submitting the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty, said:

It specifically provides that the United States alone shall do the work of building and assume the responsibility of safeguarding the canal and shall regulate its neutral use by all nations on terms of equality without the guaranty of interference of any outside nation from any quarter. * * *

Again, he says, on January 4, 1904, in a special message:

* * * Under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty it was explicitly provided that the United States should control, police, and protect the canal which was to be built, keeping it open for the vessels of all nations on equal terms. The United States thus assumes the position of guarantor of the canal and of its peaceful use by all the world.

In a note by Secretary Hay on the following day, he states:

* * * The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was conceived to form an obstacle, and the British Government therefore agreed to abrogate it, the United States only promising in return to protect the canal and keep it open on equal terms to all nations, in accordance with our traditional policy.

Aside from correspondence and declarations relating to the proposed Isthmian Canal, two negotiations remain very nearly contemporaneous with the date of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, both of which are in entire accordance with our settled national policy, but which in their bearing upon the interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty far outweigh all the preceding, not only because of the similarity in the questions involved but because of the further fact that they are so nearly contemporaneous with the negotiation of the treaty. The facts pertaining to them must have been clearly in mind when the treaty was framed. They are:

First, our negotiations in relation to the so-called open door in China in 1899 and succeeding years. Great Britain, Germany, France, Russia, and Japan were the countries regarded as possessing, though in unequal degrees, an advantageous position in China. Great Britain had received a concession of the island of Hongkong in the year 1841 and had acquired a peninsula, known as Kowloon, opposite the island of Hongkong; also a 99-year lease of a tract of territory on the mainland in the Province of Kwangtung, in the extreme southern part of China. This was acquired in 1898. The total area of this last concession was 400 square miles, with a population in 1911 of 366,145. Also in 1898 the port of Weihaiwei was leased for so long a period as Port Arthur should remain in the hands of Russia, the object of which was to provide Great Britain with a suitable naval harbor in northern China and for the better protection of British commerce in the neighboring seas. The area of the territory under this lease was 285 square miles, with a population of 150,000. The lease was extended under an agreement in which provision is made that it (Weihaiwei) shall remain in the occupation of the British "so long as Port Arthur remained in the hands of any foreign power"—that is, any power other than China. Port Arthur now belongs to Japan.

Germany had a 99-year lease, granted in 1898, of Kiao-Chau, including the bay of the same name, its islands, and the north and south tongues of land at the mouth of the harbor. The extent of this is 193 square miles. In view of the possessions held, Great Britain has a sphere of influence in the Yangtze Valley and Germany a similar area of about 2,750 miles, but now extended to the whole of the Province of Shantung.

France at that time had, under a lease for 99 years, given in 1898, the port of Kuang-chou-wan to establish a naval station with coaling depot, together with adjoining islands and territory in the Province of Kwangtung in the extreme southern part of China, some 300 miles west of the British island of Hongkong. The area included in this is 325 square miles, with a population of 190,000. The sphere of influence has extended over the Yunnan Province.

Russia had a 25-year lease, granted in 1898, of Liao-Tung Peninsula, including Port Arthur, Ta-lien-wan, and the adjacent waters. The area of the land included in this lease was about 2,000 square miles, in which Port Arthur and Ta-lien-wan were the principal ports. This sphere of influence extended into South Manchuria; Russia also had a lease of land necessary for the construction of a railway 508 miles long, leading from Port Arthur to Kwanchengtsee, and another road 150 miles long, leading from Antung on the Yalu River, which is the boundary between Korea and Shengking Province, to the city of Mukden.

Each of these countries had also garrisons and a naval force in their respective spheres of influence. It was apparent that these possessions gave them a very substantial advantage in the trade of China, and it was the aim of President McKinley and Secretary Hay to obtain for our own citizens equal rights in all the Chinese Empire. With that purpose in view assurances had been given to our ambassador by the Russian minister of foreign affairs that American interests should in no way be prejudiced by Russian occupation and influence, and it was not the desire of Russia to interfere with the trade of other nations. There was an imperial decree of July 30, 1899, creating the free port of Dalny, near Ta-lien-wan Bay, and establishing free trade for the adjacent territory. In a letter to our ambassador at St. Petersburg, Mr. Hay said:

However gratifying and reassuring such assurances may be in regard to the territory actually occupied and administered it can not but be admitted that a further, clearer, and more formal definition of the conditions which are henceforth to hold within the so-called Russian "sphere of interest" in China as regards the commercial rights therein of our citizens is much desired by the business world of the United States, inasmuch as such a declaration would relieve it from the apprehensions which have exercised a disturbing influence during the last four years on its operations in China.

Mr. Hay accordingly laid down certain principles which he desired should be formally declared by the Russian Empire and by all the great powers interested in China. Of these principles he said they "will be eminently beneficial to the commercial interests of the whole world":

First. The recognition that no power will in any way interfere with any treaty port or any vested interest within any leased territory or within any so-called "sphere of interest" it may have in China.

Second. That the Chinese treaty tariff of the time being shall apply to all merchandise landed or shipped to all such ports as are within said "sphere of interest" (unless they be "free ports"), no matter to what nationality it may belong, and that duties so leviable shall be collected by the Chinese Government.

Third. That it will levy no higher harbor dues on vessels of another nationality frequenting any port in such "sphere" than shall be levied on vessels of its own nationality, and no higher railroad charges over lines built, controlled, or operated within its "sphere" on merchandise belonging to citizens or subjects of other nationalities transported through such "sphere" than shall be levied on similar merchandise belonging to its own nationals transported over equal distances.

Special attention is called to the third of the principles, the recognition of which was requested. It included a demand that no higher railroad charges over lines built, controlled, or operated within its sphere on merchandise belonging to the citizens or subjects of other nationalities should be levied than on similar merchandise belonging to its own nationals.

An identical note containing the request for recognition of the three principles was sent to France, Germany, and Russia on the same date, September 6, 1899. This same note was transmitted to Great Britain on September 22, 1899, from the London embassy; to Japan, November 13, 1899; and to Italy, November 17, 1899. The reply of Russia, dated December 30, 1899, stated that Russia had already declared Ta-lien-wan a free port, thus demonstrating its friendly intention to follow the "open-door" policy as to territory lying in the so-called "sphere of influence," and that Russia intended to claim no privileges to the exclusion of foreigners, though this assurance was given on condition that a similar declaration should be made by the other powers. Before the close of the year the other powers made a similar declaration, and under date of March 20, 1900, Secretary Hay sent instructions to all the Governments concerned, stating that all the powers had given their acceptance and that the Government of the United States would consider such acceptance final and binding.

We thus demanded equal use of the ports controlled by these various nations, equal privileges in trade, and, what is most significant of all, equal railroad rates upon railways constructed by Russia at great expense and extending into the interior through Chinese territory to a connection with railways within her own domains.

The insistence upon equal opportunity for American enterprise in China was carried so far that in 1902 Secretary Hay stated that an agreement by which China "ceded to any corporation or company" the exclusive right to open mines, establish railroads, or in any other way industrially develop Manchuria, can but be viewed with the gravest concern by the Government of the United States. He alleged this was so, because such a monopoly was a distinct breach of the stipulations of the treaties concluded between China and foreign powers, and thereby seriously affected the rights of American citizens. He concluded by saying:

The inevitable result must be the complete wreck of the policy of absolute equality of treatment of all nations in regard to trade, navigation, and commerce within the confines of the Empire.

The following year, 1903, Mr. Hay entered a protest against the demand of the Russian Government that no foreigners, except Russians, should be employed in the public service.

It is often said that we made a bad bargain when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was framed. This statement has been repeatedly made. The conclusive answer to that is contained in a very few words in a note by Secretary Hay of January 5, 1904, to which reference has already been made:

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was conceived to form an obstacle—that is, to the construction of an Isthmian Canal by us—and the British Government therefore agreed to abrogate it. The United States only promised in return to protect the canal and keep it open on equal terms to all nations, in accordance with our traditional policy.

Not only was the treaty in accordance with our traditional policy, but negotiations had been initiated contemporaneously with the negotiations with the various nations in China for an "open door," and it would have been the height of inconsistency to have made the demand for equality of treatment in China and to have denied it in a treaty relating to an Isthmian canal.

Our record was so uniform and unbroken that we could have taken no other ground. The attempt by John Adams and Franklin and Jay in the years 1782 and 1783 pointed a new way as emphatically and as decisively as any of the great principles which lie at the foundation of our Government, and were just as strenuously maintained.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I know the Senator prefers not to be interrupted, but I should like to ask him how that traditional policy is to be squared with our coastwise laws.

Mr. BURTON. Navigation is one thing, commerce is another. There are two reasons for giving a monopoly to domestic or coastwise traffic which are commonly observed the world over. One is the avoidance of smuggling; the other is the building up of a merchant marine. Navigation and commerce are very widely apart. You might as well say, "Why does a nation restrict ownership on the ground but place no restrictions on the air?"

Mr. GALLINGER. If I understood the Senator correctly—and I shall not interrupt him further—in the early part of his most interesting address he cited over and over again the fact that all of our waterways were to be open on terms of equality to all the nations of the world.

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Under that system I am sure England could have engaged in our coastwise trade. Later on we legislated to prohibit it.

Mr. BURTON. There, again, is the difference between commerce and navigation. I shall treat of that later on.

Mr. GALLINGER. I can not see the difference; but still——

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] informs me that Senator Morgan even more strongly expressed himself on this subject.

Mr. GALLINGER. While the Senator is reading what has been handed to him, I will say to the Senator that I shall be delighted to listen to the discussion whereby he is going to differentiate between commerce and navigation. If navigation does not control commerce in a very important particular, I have not correctly interpreted the term.

Mr. BURTON. There is a very great difference between the use of channels and the privilege of trading in them or in towns upon them. There must be, just so long as nations have their policy of protective duties or fiscal regulations.

Senator Morgan said:

All that is left of this general treaty is the general principle provided in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. That is, that the vessels of all nations using the canal should be treated with exact equality, without discrimination in favor of the vessels of any nation.

Again he says:

Then this convention, in article 2, proceeds to define and formulate into an agreement, intended to be world-wide in its operation, "the general principle of neutralization," established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty on the basis of the treaty of Constantinople of October, 1888, relating to the Suez Canal.

Nothing is given to the United States in article 2 of the convention now under consideration, nor is anything denied to us that is not given or denied to all other nations.

Putting us on an exact footing of equality with them. I am much obliged to the Senator from North Dakota for presenting this to me.

Second. Our demands in relation to Canadian waterways in 1888 to 1892.

On the 15th of July, 1912, in some remarks in the Senate I set forth at length the transactions with Canada at the time mentioned. The Canadian Government in council had in substance decreed that while the tolls on cargoes carried through the Welland Canal should be 20 cents per ton on eastbound freight, yet if the boat went as far as Montreal there should be a rebate of 18 cents a ton, leaving the net toll only 2 cents. This gave a preference to the port of Montreal as compared with the ports of the United States on Lake Ontario, the St. Lawrence River, and, in fact, upon the north Atlantic seaboard. Its manifest object was to increase the importance of Montreal as a port for the export of grain and other commodities. I do not wish to repeat the remarks made at that time. They appear on pages 9065 and 9066 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the Sixty-second Congress, second session.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] on last Tuesday set forth at length the messages of Presidents Cleveland and Harrison and the memoranda on this subject in the State Department, the discussion of a resolution in the House and Senate, which resolution by unanimous vote authorized the President to issue a proclamation in retaliation; also the proclamation in retaliation of August 18, 1892. This action led to a revocation of the regulation of the Canadian Government by order of the council, so that equal privileges were afforded to the ships and commerce of both nations.

The distinct assertion by all of our statesmen who took part in this controversy or declared themselves upon the subject was that by the treaty of 1871 equality of treatment was secured not only for our shipping but for our citizens, that regard must be had for the routes of transportation to prevent discrimination against the United States in trade. But it should be very carefully noted that the treaty of 1871 did not contain so strong language as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901. Indeed, it is not only plausible but extremely probable that the language of the treaty of 1871 was in mind when that of 1901 was drawn, and that the object was to secure equality beyond the possibility of any ambiguity. The language of the treaty of 1871 is:

The Government of Her Britannic Majesty engage to urge upon the Government of the Dominion of Canada to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion.

The language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise.

There is no question of territory involved in Canadian canals, either the Welland or those below Lake Ontario beside the rapids along the St. Lawrence River. They are all within the Dominion of Canada. It was not necessary to acquire the land through which they pass to build a canal as "a trust for the world." The argument in favor of the right of exclusion is, we must admit, much stronger than it is in the case of the Panama Canal; yet when a discrimination in tolls, which it was alleged was not altogether against our ships, was attempted we demanded that it should be done away with, because it discriminated against our citizens and diverted trade and transportation which naturally belonged to our own country in another direction. Can we afford to assert the principle of equality in the use of channels when it benefits us and our trade, and at the same time establish another and entirely opposite rule when the canal or route belongs to us?

In this connection it might be well for us to consider our dependence upon Canada for our traffic through artificial waterways, especially as regards the Soo Canal, the Welland, and other canals parallel to the rapids in the St. Lawrence. It will be well to compare the American traffic through them with the probable coastwise traffic through the Panama Canal. In case both countries shall adopt the same policy, which will have the advantage? Through the connecting waters between Lakes Superior and Huron in the St. Marys River there is a traffic which is the largest through any waterway in the world, except that through the Detroit and St. Clair Rivers. The total freight passing through the river in the year 1913 was 79,718,344 tons, the principal articles being, respectively, iron ore, coal, grain, and general merchandise. The iron and steel business in the United States has gained its supremacy by reason of the abundant supply of iron ore in the State of Minnesota, with very large supplies also in Wisconsin and Michigan, nearly all of which pass through this canal. By reason of the abundance and cheap transportation of these ores the United States has taken the lead among the nations in the production of iron and steel. Of course, our supply of coal must also be taken into account, but the iron ore supply and its ready transportation from Lake Superior to Lake Michigan and Lake Erie constitute the real basis of our supremacy.

In this river there are rapids, to overcome which two lateral canals have been constructed, one by us on the American side, the other on the Canadian side at the expense of the Canadian Government and under its control. In the canal on the American side there are two parallel locks, known as the Poe and the Weitzel Locks; the former has a depth of water 18.5 feet and the latter 12.9. In the canal on the Canadian side there is one lock, having a depth of 19 feet. A new lock is under construction on the American side, more ample than any of those now existing, but which will probably not be finished until October of this year. The locks on the American side are absolutely incapable of carrying the total amount of this enormous traffic. In the year 1913 the total freight passing through the Canadian canal was more than that through the American, in round numbers 42,000,000, or, more exactly, 37,022,201 tons passed through the American canal and 42,696,143 tons through the Canadian canal. Expressed in percentages, 54 per cent of the freight passed through the Canadian and 46 per cent through the American.

Suppose a policy of retaliation, or one based upon the Panama Canal act of 1912, should be adopted by Canada? American freight would be shut out from the Canadian canal, except on the payment of tolls, and the enormous traffic movement in this waterway, having a valuation of eight hundred and sixty-five millions, would be so impaired as to cause an injury to our industrial and commercial interests almost beyond computation. To make this more impressive, it may be stated that of the total traffic through this Canadian canal, in which free passage is given to American freight, less than 5,000,000 tons was Canadian, as against 37,000,000 tons of the United States, all of which was part of the coastwise commerce of this country. In comparison with this how small is the quantity which is likely to pass through the Panama Canal. Prof. Johnson, in his testimony before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, April 14 last, page 149, estimates that during the initial years in which the Panama Canal is to be utilized the net tonnage of vessels passing through will be some 10,500,000 a year. Of that 1,000,000 tons net tonnage will be contributed by the coastwise shipments, which existing legislation seeks to free from tolls. How the actual carriage will compare with the estimated tonnage, no one can tell. If I were to give my own estimate of coastwise traffic, which I should put beside that of Prof. Johnson with a great deal of deference, as he has given much study to the subject, it would be larger. But, in any event, the comparative amount is trivial, not one-twentieth of the quantity of coastwise freight which now passes in our ships through the Canadian canal in the waters connecting Lake Superior and Lake Huron.

It is for us to pause and consider this situation and to ask whether we can afford to make such a discrimination. Should the regulations continue as at present in the Canadian canal at the Soo there will be no burden upon us; should they impose tolls or otherwise exercise discrimination we should be subjected to almost incalculable damage.

The situation at the Soo does not describe the whole of conditions on our northern border. The Canadian Government is about to complete another canal at the Soo, 30 feet in depth, and a waterway from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario to replace the present Welland Canal, and in connection therewith is preparing to construct canals and improvements in the St. Lawrence, so as to give an outlet 30 feet in depth from Lake Erie and the Great Lake system of navigation to the ocean. The benefits of such a route to transportation can not be overestimated. It would make more readily available to the markets of Europe and the world all the manifold products of agriculture and industry which belong to the region tributary to the Great Lakes. At present the draft of boats from Lake Erie to the ocean is limited to 14 feet and the length to approximately 250 feet, notwithstanding there are already many ships on the lakes 550 to 600 feet in length and having a draft of more than 20 feet. Even with the limitation of the present channels, from Lake Erie through the Welland Canal to Lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence, there is a very considerable traffic. The number of tons of freight passing through the Welland Canal in 1913 was 3,570,714, of which 2,093,406 belonged to Canada and 1,477,308 belonged to the United States. In the canals around the rapids in the St. Lawrence there was a somewhat larger amount of Canadian freight amounting to 2,837,019 tons, while in vessels of the United States there were 1,465,408. In these canals tolls are charged, but there is entire equality between Canadian vessels and vessels of our own country. But should a discrimination be made, as this is a coastwise route, it would appear that in both the Welland Canal and those of the St. Lawrence a larger quantity of freight would be discriminated against in these channels than the total of the coastwise traffic which will pass through the Panama Canal.

The slight attention given in these debates to our demand from 1888 to 1892 for equal privileges in the Welland Canal and other Canadian channels is hardly fair to those who advocate the repeal of this exemption. During the debates in July and August of 1912 the demand was made that the supporters of the House bill should reconcile their position with the attitude of the United States on this question during the administrations of President Cleveland and President Harrison. I do not recall that any reply was made to that challenge of 1912 for a consistent explanation of our course in 1888 to 1892. But now, after the lapse of two years, the explanation is offered that neither Canada, nor Great Britain acting for her, ever conceded that they were wrong; but that to the last they maintained the correctness of their position and yielded merely as a matter of expediency. But does even that afford one particle of justification for us to insist upon this preference?

We made an insistent demand, not merely by diplomatic notes, but by action of Congress and by a retaliatory proclamation expressing our interpretation of the principles involved in the treaty relating to the Welland Canal and asserting the observance of our traditional policy. The action taken then was in entire harmony with declarations theretofore made in regard to the proposed Isthmian Canal and our demands in regard to other waterways in foreign countries extending over 100 years. It must be conceded that the position taken by the act of 1912 was squarely in contradiction to that of 1892.

Can we now, under changed conditions, and when we will be benefited by observing a different rule, afford to declare that our deliberate action then taken was wrong? Was there one law of honor and patriotism in 1892 and another in 1912? Does it require only 20 years to change the law of fairness between nations?

Fortunate, thrice fortunate, is that country, as well as that individual, which can sustain a contention in its own interest and obtain benefit by maintaining opposite sides in successive controversies according to its own sweet will; too fortunate, indeed, to be consistent or to be honest with ourselves or with the world.

It is maintained that to favor equal treatment in tolls at Panama is unpatriotic. If those who maintain this position are unpatriotic, were all the Senators and the Representatives and the two Presidents who maintained the opposite view in the four years mentioned lacking in patriotism?

The argument will no doubt be made that there are two distinctions which should be observed in determining the status of the Panama Canal as a waterway. The first is the difference between waters entirely within the limits of a country, which may be called national waterways, and those which flow through two or more countries, called international waterways. In the latter list are included those which serve as boundaries between two countries. It has been maintained in this discussion that the Panama route is a national waterway, as it is located upon territory owned by the United States, and thus within its sole jurisdiction. Indeed, the very extreme statement has been made that we could not respect the suggestion of another Government to make all tolls equal, because it would involve an abandonment of sovereignty. Very considerable stress has been laid upon the distinction between national and international waterways in past years, but with the increase of commercial relations and the general decrease in military operations this distinction has lost much of its importance. At present the practical reason for the regulation or prohibition of foreign ships in national waters is the prevention of frauds upon the customs revenue.

It was formerly said by many publicists that the right to use a river flowing through two countries was a natural right, while the right of a foreign vessel to navigate a river located exclusively in one country was a conventional right or dependent upon treaty. The memorandum of Secretary Foster with reference to the right of Canadian vessels to navigate the Hudson, to which reference has been made, pointed out this distinction. It is, nevertheless, the present rule to allow foreign vessels to enter and sail upon rivers entirely within the United States, at least, if they connect with other waters, natural or artificial, extending into other countries or to the sea, such as the Mississippi, the Hudson, the Columbia, and the bays along our coasts. While this privilege is secured in many cases by treaty, it is not believed, however, that the exercise of the right depends upon any conventional arrangement. It is rather granted as a matter of comity with foreign nations.

The value of this privilege is enlarged by the customs reorganization measure adopted last year and the regulations framed under it. Dating back almost to the beginning of the Government there was a distinction between ports of entry and ports of delivery. Foreign boats were allowed to touch at ports of entry, but not at ports of delivery. The reason was based upon the danger of smuggling. By the customs reorganization act this distinction between ports of entry and ports of delivery has been abolished and an additional number of ports of entry have been created at all of which foreign boats may stop. At an early date the right was asserted to exclude foreign ships from purely national waters or interior bays, like the Chesapeake and the Delaware, but this right has not been asserted in recent years. The vital question, however, is whether the Panama Canal is on the same footing with a national stream. Clearly it is not. A strip 10 miles in width was granted for its construction, but this was not a territorial acquisition. If so, it would have been absolutely contrary to our settled policy with reference to the Republics to the south of us. For this strip we pay an annual rental of $250,000, which is quite inconsistent with a fee-simple title. A width of 10 miles was regarded as necessary for the convenient construction and operation of the canal. Material was obtained from this area or zone in the work that was done. Also material was deposited upon it. Provision was made in the treaty for going outside the zone on payment of proper compensation, if necessary for the construction of the canal. It was deemed desirable that the land obtained be permanently held for the habitation of those engaged in the operation of the canal and for sanitary and police control in its immediate locality. Had the mere ground through which the canal is excavated been obtained, it would have been easy for marauders to approach it, and the safeguarding of the health of the employees would have been difficult. The language of the treaty itself expresses in the clearest terms that the grant of the land in Panama is in trust for a certain purpose and not for territory to be incorporated in the United States as a part of its general domain.

As compared with other portions of the United States the distinctions in the control exercised over this strip are very marked. There is no legislative body. There is no provision for elections. A governor is appointed by the President. In the express language of the statute, the Canal Zone "is to be held, treated, and governed as an adjunct of such Panama Canal." The customs laws of the United States are not applicable there, nor have the inhabitants of this strip the right to send their merchandise into the United States in the manner granted to the people of our country. Imports from the Canal Zone pay duties at our customhouses in the same manner as imports from a foreign country. Imports into the Canal Zone are not subject to the duties imposed by our laws. The War Department has assumed the authority of fixing customs regulations without any reference to Congress whatever. The canal, instead of being an artery of commerce, supplying a large adjacent territory, such as is the case with the great rivers or waterways of the United States, is limited to furnishing what is needed for those who operate the canal and to the promotion of its traffic. Whatever transshipment there may be, whatever coaling or supply stations may be established, are but incident to the waterway between the oceans and are provided to facilitate traffic through the canal. The most important of all, however, is the fact that this waterway is a mere connecting link between the two oceans, less than 50 miles in length, and is constructed as a part of maritime routes of great length providing a waterway to aid the means of communication between nations, many of which are remote from the canal and are located upon seas or oceans.

Second. It has been maintained that there is a marked distinction between natural and artificial waterways in the degree of control which may be exercised over them by the countries through which they pass.

The more recent declarations of publicists and international lawyers, however, all favor the idea that artificial canals connecting great bodies of waters are international waterways. This principle was asserted in the most unequivocal language in the convention relating to the Suez Canal of 1888. The duty of a country owning the territory through which a canal may be constructed to afford opportunity for its construction was maintained in the most strenuous manner by President Roosevelt in his action with reference to Colombia.

There is no clearer statement of the American view on the subject than that contained in a letter from the Hon. Lewis Cass, our Secretary of State under President Buchanan, to Mr. Lamar, our minister to the Central American States, on July 25, 1858. He wrote, in referring to the country or countries through which a canal might be constructed, the following:

Sovereignty has its duties as well as its rights, and none of these local governments * * * would be permitted, in a spirit of eastern isolation, to close these gates of intercourse on the great highways of the world and justify the act by the pretension that these avenues of trade and travel belong to them, and that they choose to shut them or, what is almost equivalent, to encumber them with such unjust regulations as would prevent their general use.

We can reach no conclusion except that a canal constructed like the Panama, under a concession, the aim and object of which is merely to provide a connecting waterway, especially in view of the language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, is to be considered as an international watercourse and subject to the rules pertaining to natural straits. There is, of course, an exception to this, so far as regards the necessity of adopting necessary regulations to protect against hostile attack, the necessity of adopting proper regulations to insure the safety of boats in passing, to provide against injury to locks and other constructions, to police the canal and enforce sanitary regulations. Again, the position of an artificial waterway is exceptional in that the cost of construction allows the imposition of tolls as a compensation for the expense of the improvement, though in many instances the improvement of natural channels so as to make them readily available for navigation is very large and, in kind, the same as the building of artificial waterways. Indeed, it is often a question over a given stretch of a river whether the most feasible method to secure navigation is by improving the main stream or by a lateral canal. In modern times the demand is that navigation have free scope, without interruption from pirates, from payment of tribute, or from discrimination. As has been pointed out, there is no nation which has been quite so insistent in this principle as our own. The tendency of recent years in the making of treaties and agreements is altogether against discrimination in the use of artificial waterways. It should again be said that our own policy, as exemplified in negotiations with Canada, shows that we have maintained the principle that when a canal is a connecting link in a longer route afforded by rivers or by sea it must be open on equal terms to all. Every declaration made upon this subject in the earlier years when negotiations were under way for an Isthmian canal would condemn in the most decisive language any attempt on our part to discriminate in our favor in any canal connecting the two oceans.

It has been frequently alleged in argument here that as we have constructed canals and improved rivers and inland waterways within our borders at great expense, and those canals and rivers are open to navigation for all citizens without charge in the way of tolls—for a statute passed in 1884 abolished all charges—our coastwise shipping is entitled to pass through the Panama Canal on similar terms of exemption. In meeting this contention we may pass by several arguments of very great importance, namely, that the Panama Canal is an extra territorial enterprise, and in this respect is sharply distinguished from the improvement of our inland waterways; also the enormous expense, reaching nearly half the amount expended on all our rivers and harbors since the foundation of the Government; also that from the very outset the universal understanding has been that tolls should be charged on ships availing themselves of this expensive waterway in order to meet a portion of the expense. The conclusive answer to this argument is that our inland waterways, free though they may be to our citizens, are also free to the boats of foreign nations, so that if this argument has any force it means not merely that our coastwise shipping should be exempt from charges, but that no tolls should be charged on any ships, foreign or domestic, going through the Panama Canal.

In stating these facts, of course a distinction should be made between navigation and commerce. No foreign boat is allowed to take on cargo at one domestic port and unload it at another. This fact renders the privilege of navigation in minor streams of slight importance and shuts out traffic between ports of our country. The privilege of navigation nevertheless exists.

The case of Olsen against Smith has been quoted as an argument to the effect that we can allow our own ships in the coastwise trade to pass through without the payment of tolls. Indeed, a considerable number of Senators seem to have relied upon this decision as a reason for their vote in 1912. Without reverting to the fact that a decision of our own Supreme Court, though worthy the very highest respect the world over, is not binding in a controversy between ourselves and other nations, the conclusive reason why this case does not settle this present controversy is the fact that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty grants entire equality to nations, their citizens or subjects, in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise; also so that there shall be no discrimination. Thus, while we might exempt our coastwise shipping from payment of tolls, we should also be required to exempt the coastwise shipping of other countries. If our coastwise shipping is exempt so that boats from New York to San Francisco do not pay tolls, there is equal reason why the coastwise ships of other countries should be exempt.

In addition to the United States, there are other countries fronting on the Atlantic or Pacific, or, more correctly, on the easterly and westerly seas, which would use these canals. They are Canada, Mexico, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica in North America, and Colombia in South America. The countries to the south of us front on the Gulf of Mexico or the Caribbean Sea as well as upon the Pacific, and in order to accommodate their traffic between different coasts of their respective countries it is necessary to use this canal. It is hardly fair to the countries to the south of us, toward which we have made such protestations of friendship and good will, to allow our coastwise shipping to be exempt while theirs must pay charges. The language of our treaties with them, to which I will make reference, when read in connection with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, precludes the idea that we intended to discriminate against them.

One argument which has not been fully presented in this discussion deserves great weight, and that is the phraseology of our treaties negotiated prior to the treaty of 1901 in reference to coastwise shipping. If it was intended to exempt coastwise shipping, why was not reference made to that fact? Practically every treaty in which there is any reference to commerce negotiated prior to that time either contains specific language, or else the exemption is necessarily implied. There is a great variety of language in these treaties, but I am unable to find one in which there is any reference to commerce which omits reference to the subject specifically or does not secure exemption by necessary implication. These provisions are for the most part of four classes: The first, in which the following language is used, or language of similar import:

> But * * * this article does not include the coasting trade of either country, the regulation of which is reserved by the parties, respectively, according to their own separate laws.

Second:

> The reciprocal liberties of commerce [granted in the treaty] shall be subject always to the laws and statutes of the two countries, respectively.

Third:

> Contracting parties shall enjoy all the privileges and advantages, with respect to commerce or otherwise, which are now or which may hereafter be granted to the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation.

Fourth:

> The inhabitants of the two countries, respectively, shall have liberty freely and securely to come with their ships and cargoes to all such places aforesaid, to which other foreigners are permitted to come and to enter the same.

These last two forms would not permit participation in coasting trade, because neither the favored nation or other foreigners are granted that right. The first two forms manifestly are not subject to any doubt.

Those in which the coastwise exemption does not specifically appear are for the most part treaties made many years ago, or, if recently, with remote countries, such as the treaty with Borneo in 1850, that with the International Association of the Kongo in 1891, with Korea in 1882, with Egypt in 1884, with Servia in 1881, that with Prussia in 1785, with Tripoli in 1796, and that with Great Britain in 1815, which last, however, contains an express provision that the reciprocal liberty of commerce shall be subject always to the laws and statutes of the two countries, respectively.

It is noteworthy that the specific exemption of the coastwise trade is contained in the treaties with the following States to the south of us: Mexico, Costa Rica, Nicaragua, Honduras, Guatemala, Salvador, Venezuela, Ecuador, Chile, Peru, and Brazil.

The treaties pertaining to a proposed Isthmian canal are especially significant. In that of 1846 with New Granada there are two provisions. Article 3 contains the usual clause exempting the coastwise trade of either country. Article 35, which has to do with the ports of the Isthmus of Panama or any road or canal across the Isthmus that may be made by the Government of New Granada, or by the authority of the same, provides that there shall be no other tolls or charges levied or collected from the citizens of the United States than are, under like circumstances, levied and collected from the Granadian citizens.

The Cass treaty of November 26, 1857, with Nicaragua, known as the Cass-Yrisarri treaty, in article 2 reserves the coastwise trade; article 14 grants transit on terms of equality to the Atlantic and Pacific, and contains the provision that no higher charges or tolls shall be imposed on the conveyance or transit of persons or property of citizens or subjects of the United States or any other country across said route of communication than are or may be imposed on the persons or property of citizens of Nicaragua. This treaty was not ratified. Other treaties with Nicaragua and other countries make unequivocal reference to the coastwise trade.

In the treaty with Panama of 1903 there is in article 19 an exemption of the vessels of the Republic of Panama and its troops and munitions of war in such vessels from the payment of charges of any kind. This shows that when an exemption was intended it was regarded as necessary to state it. The Frelinghuysen-Zavala treaty made in 1884 and recommended by President Arthur in his message of the same year, but withdrawn by President Cleveland in his first annual message of 1885, contained this provision in article 14:

> The tolls hereinbefore provided shall be equal as to vessels of the parties hereto and of all nations, except that vessels entirely owned and commanded by citizens of either one of the parties to this convention and engaged in its coasting may be favored.

Thus all of these treaties—that with New Granada, the proposed agreements with Nicaragua, and the treaty with Panama—show that in all our negotiations pertaining to an isthmian canal when it was intended to exempt coastwise shipping or to grant any preferences it was specifically so stated.

Now, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 contained no exemption of coastwise shipping, but, on the contrary, the very strongest language to express entire equality.

Is it to be believed that when, through a series of years in practically all countries near to the proposed canal, coastwise shipping was exempt from the provisions of the treaties in the most definite language it could have been intended to claim exemption or preference for our own coastwise shipping in this canal, built on soil acquired from a foreign country and connecting the two great oceans of the world, without any language whatever on the subject? If it was intended to exempt our coastwise shipping, why did we not say so? This, too, in the face of our own "traditional policy" asserted against Canada less than 10 years before, and asserted contemporaneously, at least in principle, in negotiations with the nations having spheres of influence in the Chinese Empire.

This contention is strengthened by the fact that almost all of our shipping is that engaged in the coastwise trade. The Statistical Abstract for 1912 shows the registered tonnage in our foreign trade to be 923,000 tons; that in our domestic or coastwise trade is 6,737,000 tons, or more than seven times as much. Is it credible that a treaty providing equality could be framed merely to include the limited quantity of shipping which is engaged in our foreign trade? We all regret that it is so small, but such is the fact. If it was intended that our coastwise trade should be exempt, the provision of equality becomes a practical nullity. Special importance may be assigned to this fact, because so many countries to which reference has already been made, including the countries to the south of us, also have coastwise shipping which would utilize this canal.

In opposing this bill for repeal nothing has been more frequent than an appeal to patriotism and to national pride. Any such appeal must necessarily be received with a responsive spirit, and if made with earnestness it stirs the heart. But patriotism does not mean that we shall disregard treaty obligations or swerve from policies which have been maintained with persistency and zeal through all our national life. It is our duty to maintain a scrupulous regard for national faith and to follow the rules which we have laid down for ourselves as well as for all other nations. To be consistent and to be fair to all the world, that is patriotism. If we retrace our steps from the ennobling record which has characterized us for more than 100 years, let us beware lest the most inspiring notes of patriotism, though uttered with the tongues of men and of angels, may become as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, if no other Senator desires to address the Senate on the subject of the unfinished business this afternoon, I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Louisiana to withhold that request for a moment.

Mr. THORNTON. It is withheld.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I offer an amendment, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

> That the second sentence in section 5 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1913, which reads as follows: "No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States," shall be suspended and shall not take effect as a statute of the United States until July 1, 1915, on which date it shall have full force and effect as a statute law of the United States. It is further provided that the proper authorities operating said Panama Canal who shall, prior to said date, collect tolls levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States are hereby directed to set apart all such tolls so collected and retain the same in a separate fund until July 1, 1915. On that date, or as soon thereafter as possible, such tolls so collected shall be returned to the parties from whom they were collected, provided no contrary disposition has been made by law prior to that time.

That so soon as practicable after the passage of this act the President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a commission, consisting of not less than three nor more than five persons, to be selected by him for the purpose of meeting a like commission to be appointed by His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the seas, in a diplomatic conference to be held at such time and place as His Britannic Majesty and the President of the United States may agree upon. The purpose of such diplomatic conference shall be to take into consideration the controversy now pending between Great Britain and the United States as to the proper construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, so far as the provisions of the same involve the right of the latter to regulate by its own legislation the levying of tolls upon vessels engaged in its coastwise trade and passing through said Panama Canal. It shall be the duty of such diplomatic conference, acting in the light of the discussions that have already taken place, to seek, in an equitable and friendly spirit some practical solution of the entire question now at issue, which will worthily round out a hundred years of peace and friendship by respecting and conserving the interests and honor of both nations. The conclusions reached by such diplomatic conference shall be reported at its close to the Governments of Great Britain and the United States by their respective commissioners, but such conclusions shall not be binding upon either Government until accepted by both and duly ratified upon the part of the United States by the necessary and appropriate legislation.

That the expenses and compensation of the said commissioners to be appointed to attend said diplomatic conference upon the part of the United States shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Department of State according to law.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, the honor of a nation like the honor of man is its most priceless asset, and should be sacredly guarded. The same code of morals should govern nations in their dealings with each other which men require their fellows to observe in their intercourse with each other. The might which overrides the right may triumph for a season, but there is no permanency in any system of government or rule of conduct among nations or individuals except that which was founded upon the eternal rock of justice and righteousness. It has been truthfully said that—

Out of the twilight of the past
We move to a diviner light;
For nothing that is wrong can last,
Nothing's immortal but the right.

In the settlement of the question as to whether or not the United States Government has the right under the treaty with Great Britain to exempt its ships engaged in coastwise trade from the payment of tolls in passing through the Panama Canal, the American people do not want anything except that which is just and unquestionably their own. If they have made a mistake in their platform declaration, if the people have misunderstood this question in their instructions to their representatives, when they shall be convinced of that fact the wrong will be righted.

I have no doubt in my own mind about the right of the United States Government under the terms of the treaty to do with the canal as it sees fit with reference to our coastwise trade. I believe that out sovereignty over the canal is as absolute and complete as it is over the Mississippi River or any other domestic waterway. But if there were any doubt in my mind about our sovereignty, the people of Mississippi and America have instructed me upon that point. Every political platform adopted in 1912 gave specific instructions to the President, Senators, and Congressmen elected upon that platform as to how they should vote upon this question. I believe in the sacredness of our party platform promises. I believe in the wisdom and patriotism of party organization. I realize that no great governmental scheme or question of political economy was ever enacted into law but that had behind it a well-organized and disciplined political faction. No man can be faithless to his platform promises and be true to himself and his country. The platform is to me a political confession of faith, and the man who violates it without permission from the people betrays his constituents. So far as I am concerned, I am going to be true to the people who elected me. I am going to be faithful to my party obligations. If in this instance loyalty to the platform promises shall raise the question of violation of the treaty with England, I shall still be true to the platform promises and faithful to my constituents. But there are men of greater wisdom, more varied experience, of larger observation, and equal patriotism who entertain opinions diametrically opposite to those entertained by me. I am perfectly willing to concede to them sincerity and honesty of purpose, and to admit that I may be mistaken. In matters of such grave importance, so far-reaching in their consequences, and about which men differ so widely the largest, most liberal, and careful consideration should be given to all the phases of the question under consideration. In the determination of this matter we can not afford to be too technical, nor can we afford to be other than generous in dealing with our opponents and faithful to every promise which we have made directly or implied. Our constituents would not have us do less. And under the terms of our commission as the representatives of the people executing a great trust we can not do more. I want to say in this connection, Mr. President, that I do not in any way share the feeling of hostility toward the English people or the English Government which some of my fellow countrymen manifest in the treatment of this question. I realize that the future development and the moral and material uplift of the world will be greatly promoted by united and harmonious action on the part of the English-speaking peoples; but their good influence will be minimized unless they shall, in international intercourse, maintain scrupulous regard for the rights of each other, and avoid the appearance of trying to drive a hard bargain or take undue advantage. There should be no competition between the people of Great Britain and the people of America, except that healthy spirit of rivalry which only serves to quicken our patriotism, enlarge our energies, and sharpen our intellects in solving the great problems, industrial and otherwise, which confront the civilization of the century. "There is a destiny that makes us brothers." We are one in thought, one in aspirations, and bent upon one common purpose. United we shall rule the world, direct its destiny, preserve its peace, and hasten the day when—

The common sense of most shall hold a fretful realm in awe,
And the kindly earth shall slumber, lapt in universal law.

If the amendment which I propose shall be adopted, this matter can be settled without heartburnings, disappointments, or the generation of hatred. We are committed to the policy of settling differences of this character by diplomatic conferences. It is the rational, humane, and proper method. It will also give time for the American people to consider the question. A general understanding will be effected and justice tempered with a spirit of generosity and good-fellowship will take the place of what I fear will be a feeling of disappointment, injustice, and wrong if the plan for the settlement of the question proposed by the President shall be adopted by the Congress.

I hope to have something further to say upon this question during the consideration of the bill.

Mr. THORNTON. I now renew the request that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside in order that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry may ask that the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill be resumed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

THE CONGRESSIONAL CLUB.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I have here an invitation to Members of the Senate from the Congressional Club, which I should like to have read at the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The communication was read, as follows:

The Congressional Club requests the honor of the presence of the Members of the United States Senate at the ceremonies incident to the laying of the corner stone of the new clubhouse on Thursday morning, May 21, at half past 10 o'clock, New Hampshire Avenue and U Street NW.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. GORE. I ask that the Agricultural appropriation bill be laid before the Senate and proceeded with.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13679) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned yesterday I had the floor in reference to an amendment which I proposed to offer to the bill. I desire to give very brief attention to that proposition.

Anticipating the eagerness of Senators to vote upon this bill, I desire to show how a proposed amendment is necessary, or why the pending bill is incomplete and should not be passed without the proper amendment. I have already called attention to the fact that from line 4 to line 6 on page 19 there is the following provision:

For investigating the handling, grading, and transportation of grain and the fixing of definite grades thereof, $76,320.

This provision as it now stands is a mere mockery. It means nothing. The mere fixing of a grade without any method of enforcing the decree which fixes the grade of course amounts to nothing; and I anticipate that is not what was intended by the person who drafted this provision of the bill. Therefore it is my desire to have that definite grade fixed in a definite manner, and I shall limit the proposed amendment to that particular matter.

You are to fix a definite grade. Now, how can you make a grade definite without power to enforce its definiteness?

It has been claimed that this matter would be subject to a point of order upon the ground that it is general legislation. I wish Senators would stop a little while and see if we can not, with the assistance of the Chair, finally adopt something of a rule which we can use as a precedent which will guide us in the future in determining what is and what is not general legislation.

The records of the Senate show that the point of general legislation has been raised against an amendment to add a wing to a particular building, as though that was general legislation. Further, it has been argued upon this floor time and again that anything that changes existing law, though it be a special law, is general legislation.

Why, Mr. President, if we should follow the theories of some of these objectors to amendments upon the ground that they are general legislation, we would be absolutely crippled in any effort to amend any bill that might come from the House.

The parliamentarian of the Senate, Mr. Gilfry, recognizing the fact that we have steered our parliamentary course all over the ocean of conjecture in the matter of this question of general legislation, sought to call our minds back to a few fundamental principles, so that we might appreciate our course, and I call attention to some of the declarations made by him on this subject. He says:

No subject is more widely discussed in the Senate during the consideration of appropriation bills and amendments thereto than the question What is general legislation on a general appropriation bill?

The Century Dictionary says:

"General legislation, that legislation which as applicable throughout the State generally, as distinguished from special legislation, which affects only particular persons or localities.

"Local legislation, local statute, such legislation or statute as is in terms applicable not to the State at large, but only to some district or locality and to the people therein."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if he will kindly give us the citation?

Mr. McCUMBER. Page 54 of "Precedents, Decisions on Points of Order in the United States Senate," by Mr. Gilfry.

Proceeding, he states——

Mr. REED. Since I have interrupted the Senator, may I inquire why the Senator is discussing a question of order with reference to his proposed amendment before the amendment is laid before the Senate? Of course, the Senator will proceed in his own way, I take it; but it seems to me the ordinary procedure would be to offer the amendment, and if some one raises the question of order, then it will be a matter for consideration, but not to anticipate that the point will be made.

Mr. McCUMBER. In answer to the Senator's question, I will say that I had hoped that it would prevent considerable delay in the discussion of the subject hereafter if I might call attention to a few leading principles which might dissuade Senators from making points of order which would lead to a long discussion.

The author goes on further and cites the definition given by Bouvier in volume 1, page 877:

General law (legislation): Laws which apply to and operate uniformly upon all members of any class of persons, places, or things, requiring legislation peculiar to themselves in the matters covered by the laws. Statutes which relate to persons and things as a class. Laws that are framed in general terms, restricted to no locality, and operating equally upon all of a group of objects which, having regard to the purpose of the legislation, are distinguished by characteristics sufficiently marked and important to make them a class by themselves.

There is considerable more in the definition given by Bouvier, but I will not take the time to read it.

Generally all matters of this kind have been submitted to the Senate. Upon that point I wish to cite a statement that was made by Vice President Fairbanks:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is before the Senate.

Then the Vice President discussed the question of points of order on the ground that matters were general legislation. He said:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] makes the point of order that the pending amendment contravenes paragraph 3 of Rule XVI, which provides: "No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill." What is general legislation upon a general appropriation bill, under Rule XVI, has long been a sharply debated question. The rule is an old one. It has been frequently invoked, and the discussion has invariably disclosed the same conflicting views which have been expressed with respect to the point of order now interposed. There is no well-defined uniform line of decisions, either by the Chair or by the Senate, when the question has been submitted by the Chair to its determination or when the question has been brought before it by an appeal from the decision of the Chair. The impression created upon the mind of the present occupant of the chair, after a somewhat careful and thorough examination of the subject, is that the Senate has been largely controlled in its interpretation of the rule for more than a third of a century by a consideration of the public interest involved at the time being, rather than by any regard for its technical meaning or strict application.

That is what that rule has finally come to be—a mere capricious action of the Senate. If the Senate wants the amendment upon the bill, it puts it in by declaring that it is not general legislation. If the Senate does not want it in, it holds against the amendment as being general legislation.

I think we ought to have some rule to guide us on this important question, which arises upon every appropriation bill from fifty to a hundred times before it passes through the Senate; and I know of no better guide than that laid down by Mr. Gilfry himself in his Precedents, in which he cites the definitions given by Bouvier and the Century Dictionary.

I shall offer an amendment to make certain the provision that I have read from the general bill—that is, to fix definite rules for the definite grades that are to be fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture. I shall do this by offering that portion of what is known as the Lever bill in the House, or the Gore bill in the Senate, which has received the earnest approval of those who are opposed to the general legislation which I sought, and which covered general inspection. The very first step toward the remedy, as I stated before, was covered by the Lever bill, namely, Federal standardization; and the second step was also covered by it, namely, uniformity of standards. The third step which I thought was necessary was Federal inspection. The substitute for that in the Lever bill was Federal supervision. I have not, however, offered, and shall not offer, any portion of the Lever bill which relates even to Federal supervision. I allow the States to go on with their inspection, but I propose merely to provide that the Secretary of Agriculture shall fix standards of grain as he fixes standards of cotton; and after he has arrived at those standards, the rules shall be lived up to by the several boards.

To show that this is greatly desired by all the farmers of the Northwest, I desire attention to the fact that but a few years ago I was called upon to address the farmers' organization known as the Tri-State Grain Growers' Association of the States of Minnesota and the two Dakotas. There were about 3,000 representatives present. I did not discuss the grain bill at that time, but they were decidedly interested in it. When I had closed my remarks a very prominent member of the society asked me to explain to the farmers there present why it was that the Senate of the United States refused to give them the relief for which the State legislature had been appealing for years, and for which they, through their little organizations, had also appealed by petitions.

My answer to them was that the whole trouble lay in the fact that we had no great farmers' organization that would act as an organization, and would make their views felt as an organization, in the way that all other organized societies give expression to their views to control or influence the action of Congress.

I called their attention to the fact that wherever we had a great board of trade I would be certain to have at least two Senators from that State against me. If in New York, we had the Board of Trade of New York and also that of Buffalo engaged in the grain business, that meant the two votes of New York against what I was asking for. If I found the same condition in Minnesota, it would have the same result. If I found another one in Chicago, I could count the Illinois Members against me. If I found one in Baltimore, I could count the Maryland votes against the proposition. If I found one in New Orleans, I could be sure to count the Louisiana votes against me. If I found one in Toledo, I could be pretty sure to count the Ohio votes against me. If I found one in some other particular State—in Nebraska, in Omaha—I would be pretty certain to find at least the Senator within the radius of its influence against me.

Now, why? They were honest Senators, who wanted to do what was right or what they thought was just and fair in all this matter; but the moment you introduce a bill of this kind the farmer does not come to his Senator and, through his organization, say: "We demand this, and we expect you to live up to it." He does not say anything; but the board of trade immediately begins to talk, and it sends out its circulars, and it sends its representatives to the Capital, and it secures the best legal talent that it can secure to present its case; and the Senator thinks: "Well, now, here are all these people in the city, my friends, protesting against the bill, and there is not a single farmer in my State asking for it. I have not time to go into the subject very much and look up your interest in the matter. If it is not of sufficient interest to you to present it in the same aggressive way that it is presented on the other side, it can not be a matter of any great importance."

Those were the reasons I gave to the farmers. Then I was compelled to give another reason, and that was the ancient Democratic policy of holding the State outside the grip of national policies, to give full vent to State rights. I stated to them that most of the old Bourbon Democracy were opposed to extending national legislation into their States under any and all considerations, with the exception of a single one; that they would waive their prejudice in favor of State rights wherever they could find that the Government would expend its money within their territory, and if the Government would kindly do that there would be no objection whatever to the extension of Federal influence into the State.

So we find here about $400,000 that is to be used down here in the southern section, the Democratic section, of the country, to send an army of inspectors chasing the cattle tick. Four hundred thousand dollars is appropriated for that class of chasers; and we have not the slightest objection to the extension of the Federal power if it carries that army into our State, where they may do us some good by spending the Government money there and possibly by frightening away some of the cattle ticks.

Then again there is $46,000 appropriated to control diseases of cotton. Then there is appropriated for improvement of cotton $38,000. Then for fixing standards, and so forth, of cotton and other matters there is an appropriation of $300,000. Then there is for farm demonstration $400,000, about $300,000 of which is to be used in that section of the country where the Senators do not believe very much in Federal interference. Now, as they have overcome that in the last few years, I hope they will give us the same consideration when we are really asking for Federal interference. We have always said that we were willing that the Federal Government should extend its powerful arm to assist us and protect us against injustice and against fraud.

Now, I desire to present, Mr. President, an amendment that will contain the two or three paragraphs of the Lever bill.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McCUMBER. With pleasure.

Mr. WEST. I presume we are in Committee of the Whole, are we not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WEST. That is what I mean. The bill is in Committee of the Whole, and this section has already been considered, and the Senator can not present an amendment to the section without reconsidering it for the purpose of amending it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator is under the impression that this is an amendment that I am considering. I am considering not an amendment, but the original bill itself.

Mr. WEST. Is it not a substitute?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I am going to amend the text of the original bill, if I can.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota is in order.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, a short time ago, when we were discussing this question, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] stated, in substance, that he knew nothing about the matter, and that where the doctors disagreed a layman could not be expected to decide what the remedy should be in the particular case. I want to say to that Senator and also to his colleague that the doctors have finally agreed upon two or three propositions I wish to present, first, the statement of Dr. NELSON upon this proposition. I am offering the Lever bill. I feel that I possibly ought to apologize to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] for a little suspicion when the bill was up before and for an expression I made in conformity with that suspicion to the effect that the Lever bill was not intended in good faith; that it was simply introduced as a check for the time being so that the McCumber bill could be in some way knocked out, and that they really did not believe in the Lever bill. But I have read over their statements again, and they are so strong and ring so true that I know they meant every word they said, and will be very glad of the opportunity now to vote for the proposition which they extolled so earnestly in the previous discussion.

I will start in with the statement of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. He said, as recorded on page 5356 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

> I will follow that by the statement that I am in entire accord with the purpose of the Department of Agriculture and all those who have worked in joint effort with that department to procure and establish, upon adequate investigation, a uniform system, both of grades and weights, and to make it obligatory upon all grain entering into the interstate commerce of the country to require the States having an inspection system established under their statutes to bring themselves to adopt that standard before the grains in the States of their origin shall be admitted into interstate commerce. I am not opposed to, but, on the contrary, I believe in, these inspections and grades and in a uniform system of weights; but I do not think it is necessary that a new bureau be created here under the auspices of the Federal Government, and that the State inspection system of some of the principal grain-producing States in the Union, and also some of the States in which there are the large primary markets of the country, be entirely obliterated and pulled up by the roots, so to speak, in order to accomplish these purposes. I am not against the end sought by the Senator from North Dakota, but I am opposing the means, because, in my judgment, the Lever bill, introduced in the House of Representatives very lately, will accomplish all of the good results desired, and standardize both weights and measures, without any corresponding evils.

That is a pretty good recommendation. Again, he says on page 5357:

> On the contrary, under the supervision plan, I believe, the standards being fixed by the Department of Agriculture under some such bill as the Lever or the Gore bill, that the State inspection would immediately be required to come up to that level; if it lacked anything in reaching that degree of perfection or desirability, it would immediately go to that level. Otherwise, the State inspection system falling short, grains inspected under that system would necessarily cease to go into the interstate commerce of the country. That would of itself bring State inspection to that level.

Again, the Senator from Illinois said a day or two later, on May 9, at page 8710:

> I do not think there will be any controversy between those who support this bill—

That was my bill—> and myself about the necessity as well as the propriety of a uniformity of grades. Since I have begun to give this subject some attention, reaching back several years ago, it has seemed to me at all times that uniformity of grades is desirable.

Again, he says on page 8719:

> Let me say here parenthetically there is no controversy between those who favor this bill and those who oppose it on the desirability of uniformity. There ought to be uniformity in the standards. The principle of the Lever bill in the House gives uniformity. It seems the same as that introduced by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

Well, it is the same.

> I have not read them one along with the other, but I believe them to be exactly similar. The uniformity of grades is the useful part of every regulation. The uniformity can be secured by fixing the standards, and in that event every State having an inspection system can be compelled to grade up to the standard fixed by the Department of Agriculture. When that is done you have uniformity. You have uniformity under the supervision of the General Government and not the inspection of the General Government. I favor uniformity of standards and Government supervision, to be worked out so as not to destroy or impair our State inspection systems.

Again, on page 8725, the Senator quotes a letter from Frank H. Funk, favoring Federal standardization and uniformity but opposing Federal inspection.

On the same page the Senator quotes, with approval, a letter from the secretary of the Illinois Grain Dealers' Association, which I quote as he quoted it:

> Your support of the Lever bill in opposition to the McCumber bill meets with the approval of practically every grain dealer in the State of Illinois. The country shippers represented by the State associations of Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, and Oklahoma have been working for Federal supervision for a number of years and it is believed that such a measure of protection will be entirely satisfactory.

Once again, on page 8726, the Senator from Illinois states:

> These purposes of the different State inspection systems are perpetuated and provided for in the Lever bill now pending in the House. The Lever bill represents the views of the Department of Agriculture, the arm of the Federal Government that is asked by Senate bill No. 120 to absorb the inspection systems of the States.

Again, on page 8726, the Senator from Illinois quotes, with approval, a letter from Mr. Merrill, and I want Senators to listen to this for one moment. Mr. Merrill says:

> Exchanges, State and local associations of grain handlers, have generally united in opposing it (the McCumber bill), and thus far have succeeded.

That is the most solemn truth that they ever uttered in their lives. They have consistently opposed it and so far they have succeeded. Quoting from the same letter:

> A committee representing farmers and all classes of grain handlers is now drawing up such a bill and the Department of Agriculture of the United States is assisting, Secretary Houston having met the committee in conference and approves the action.

Now, proceeding again, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] says:

> This was written last February. Since that time the bill has been perfected through the joint action of the persons named in this bill and the department, and it is now pending in the name of the Lever bill. The Gore bill, which is pending in the Senate, I think is identically the same bill.

Then the Senator cites letters covering several pages, all favoring the Gore and Lever bill and, of course, all opposing the McCumber bill. Now, with the strong argument of the Senator from Illinois, which was given here some time ago, there ought not to be a single vote in the Senate against the little amendment which I propose to-day.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] adds his moral power and impetus to the Gore bill, also known as the Lever bill. On April 14, at page 8201, the Senator from Minnesota said:

To the Lever bill, so called—and a similar bill has been introduced in the Senate by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]—in its essential features we have no objection; such a law would not destroy our State grain-inspection system.

Again, on page 8207, the Senator from Minnesota said:

There is no objection to creating national standards; * * * we can establish uniform standards of grain for the whole country, leaving the inspection in the hands of each State government, simply requiring them to adhere to the Federal standard. The Lever bill in substance so provides, and a similar bill has been introduced by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] in the Senate. We are quite willing that grades shall be standardized; we have no objection to that.

Again, on page 8227, the Senator from Minnesota reiterates:

Our people are not opposed to standardizing grades; that is, to let the Federal Government establish the standards, but leaving the States to carry on the inspection service and comply with the standards.

Again, on page 8230, the Senator from Minnesota supports the Gore bill. He says:

If the bill were confined to sections 5, 6, and 7—

That is, sections 5, 6, and 7 of my bill—providing for national standardization and nothing more, it would be unobjectionable and would accomplish all that is necessary and proper. I call attention to those sections.

The Senator then read the three sections in full. Then he proceeds:

If you take these three sections and limit the bill to them, you can get national standards for the whole country established by the Federal Government that will be standards for all interstate commerce. If you stop there, you leave the inspection force of each state to live up to those standards. To say that we are not capable in Minnesota or that they are not capable in Missouri or Illinois is to say that the employees of the State are not as competent and are not as honest as they would be if they were Federal employees and wore Uncle Sam's livery.

The Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Illinois were reenforced by the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. I will not stop to read the statement of the senior Senator from New York but it is to be found on page 5356, in which he quotes with great approval the circular which was sent out by the Buffalo Exchange and also by the New York Exchange, and a similar note sent out by the Boston Exchange, all of which stated that they were perfectly satisfied with what is known as the Gore bill. The Senator said he was willing to support that bill; but he saw a good deal of force in their objections to the McCumber bill.

Now, what was the Gore bill? The Gore bill provided for the standardization and then fixed rules requiring the Government to supervise the matter, and it then appropriated, I think, $350,000 to carry out that supervision.

Now, I do not go that far, because I do not wish this amendment to be open to the objection that it carries a great appropriation without an estimate from the department, and really I do not need it, because the Secretary of Agriculture with the appropriation of $76,320 can do all that is required under this amendment, and I am in fact simply directing how he shall fix those standards and enforce them.

Now taking the bill as it stands on page 19, it reads:

For investigating the handling, grading, and transportation of grain and the fixing of definite grades thereof, $76,320.

Then I propose to provide:

That in fixing said definite grades the Secretary of Agriculture shall fix and establish from time to time standards of quality and condition of grain. In promulgating the standards the Secretary shall specify the date or dates when the same are to become effective, and may give public notice thereof by such means as he deems proper.

Remember, now, I am quoting literally from the Gore or Lever bill. I only add "in fixing said definite grades," whereas in the other bill they propose that the Secretary of Agriculture shall do so and so, using that term, in fixing said grades to make the proper connection with the previous legislation:

That the standards so fixed and established shall be known as the official grain standards of the United States.

That whenever standards shall have been fixed and established under this act for any grain no person thereafter shall ship or deliver for shipment from any State, Territory, or District, to or through any other State, Territory, or District, or to any foreign country, any such grain which is sold or offered for sale by grade, unless the grade by which it is sold or offered for sale be one of the grades fixed therefor in the official grain standards of the United States and the grain conforms to the standard fixed and established for the specified grade.

Then here comes the provision that the Senators who oppose my bill desire:

Provided, That variations from the official grain standards may be permitted under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture shall prescribe. No person shall, in any contract or agreement of sale or agreement to sell, either oral or written, or in any invoice or bill of lading or other shipping document, relating to such shipment or delivery for shipment, describe or in any way refer to any of such grain as being of any grade other than a grade fixed therefor in the official grain standards of the United States.

That whenever standards shall have been fixed and established under this act for any grain, no person thereafter shall ship or deliver for shipment from any State, Territory, or District, to or through any other State, Territory, or District, or to any foreign country, any such gain which is sold or offered for sale, whether by grade or not, under any name, description, or designation which is false or misleading in any particular.

And here comes another provision the lack of which was urged as an objection to my bill, Senate bill 120:

Provided, That nothing contained herein shall prevent the shipment or delivery for shipment, otherwise lawful, of any grain which is sold or offered for sale, without reference to grade, under names, descriptions, or designations which are not false or misleading.

That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cause inspections and examinations to be made of any grain which has been certified or represented to conform to any grade fixed in the official grain standards of the United States, and to ascertain whether the grain is, in fact, of the specified grade; and whenever, after opportunity for hearing is given to the owner or shipper of the grain involved, it is determined by the Secretary that any lot of grain has been incorrectly certified or represented to conform to a specified grade he may publish his findings.

That every person who shall violate any provision of this act relating to the shipment or standardization of grain, as herein provided, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not exceeding $200 for the first offense and for each succeeding offense not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. President, that is the amendment which I offer, and, as I stated before, it is that portion of the Lever bill that has been spoken of by those who are opposed to the provisions of my bill, and which seem, as is shown by their declaration, to be entirely agreeable to them. I offer that as an amendment as indicated.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota presents an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of line 6, on page 19, insert——

Mr. McCUMBER. As I read the amendment myself, I do not think it is necessary under the rules for the Secretary to reread it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Very well.

Mr. McCUMBER. I make the suggestion in order to save time.

Mr. REED. Is the amendment now offered?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is offered.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I make the point of order against the amendment, first, that the amendment is general legislation; second, that the amendment includes items not estimated for by any department of the Government; third, that the amendment has not been favorably reported on by any committee; and, fourth, that the amendment is practically a repetition at the same session of Congress of a bill already defeated at that session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes that there is a great deal of truth in what the Senator from North Dakota has said as to the ruling of the Senate upon the question of general legislation on an appropriation bill, and that it is always within the province of the Senate to determine when an amendment is or when it is not general legislation by an appeal from the ruling of the Chair. But the Chair believes that the point of order in this instance should be sustained. Accordingly it is sustained.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have another amendment that I desire to offer.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WEST. I propose to amend the bill when it comes into the Senate, on page 20, by striking out the last proviso.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and subject to amendment.

Mr. WEST. Yes; I understand that. I am merely stating the amendments which I propose to offer when the bill is reported to the Senate. In addition to the amendment which I have stated, I propose to amend the bill, on page 42, line 23, by striking out "Western" and substituting therefor "United States"; and then, in line 20, by striking out "$15,000" and substituting therefor "$30,000." That does not change the total appropriation.

Mr. McCUMBER. I offer the following amendment: On page 19, after the same words to which I referred in the other amendment, I move to insert:

That said Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized and required, as soon as may be after the enactment hereof, to determine and fix, according to such standards as he may provide, such classifications and grading of wheat, flax, corn, rye, oats, barley, and other grains as in his judgment the usages of trade may warrant and permit. In the inauguration of the work herein provided he may, if in his judgment the best interests of trade and commerce in said grains require it, adopt the standards of classification and grades now recognized by commercial usages or established by the laws of any State or by boards of trade or chambers of commerce, and may modify or change such classifications or grades from time to time as in his judgment shall be for the best interests of interstate and export grain trade.

That when such standards are fixed and the classification and grades determined upon the same shall be made matter of permanent record in the Agricultural Department, and public notice thereof shall be given in such manner as the Secretary shall direct, and thereafter such classification and grades shall be known as the United States standard.

That from and after 30 days after such classifications and grades have been determined upon and fixed, and duly placed on record as hereinafter provided, such classification and grading shall be taken and held to be the standard in all interstate commerce in grain.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota permit me to make an inquiry?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will not yield at this time.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I will not yield now, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply desire to state in reference to this amendment that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] said:

If the bill were confined to sections 5, 6, and 7—

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. REED. I make the point of order. I understand the Senator has now offered his amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is uncertain on that question.

Mr. REED. I think the parliamentary situation ought to be cleared up. I understood the Senator from North Dakota to say that he had offered that amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not yielded, and I do not think in the middle of another Senator's address the Senator can raise the point of order. I raise the point of order that the Senator can not be recognized for that purpose without my consent.

Mr. REED. A point of order is always in order.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator can rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rules of the Senate are to the effect that a question of order may be raised at any stage of the proceedings. The Chair will read the rule:

A question of order may be raised at any stage of the proceedings, except when the Senate is dividing.

So the Senator from Missouri, if he desires to make a point of order, has the right to do so now.

Mr. REED. I understood the Senator from North Dakota to say that he now offered "the following amendment," and he then proceeded to read his amendment. The amendment is, therefore, before the Senate; and I make the point of order that the amendment is general legislation; that the amendment includes items not estimated for by any department of the Government; that the amendment has not been favorably reported by any committee; and that the amendment is practically a reintroduction at the same session of Congress of a bill already defeated at the present session. Upon that point of order I ask for the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to state in reference to that——

Mr. REED. The question is not debatable, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is not debatable; but, as the Chair understands the rule of the Senate, amendments must be sent to the desk and presented to the Senate. The reading of an amendment by a Senator, it not having been sent up to the Secretary's desk, does not constitute a presentation of the amendment to the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. That was the point of order I desired to state.

I will proceed to quote what the Senator from Minnesota said with reference to these three sections. He said:

If the bill were confined to sections 5, 6, and 7—

Those are the three sections which I read—

providing for national standardization and nothing more, it would be unobjectionable and would accomplish all that is necessary and proper. I call attention to those sections.

Then the Senator read the three sections which I have read, and proceeded:

If you take these three sections and limit the bill to them, you can get national standards for the whole country established by the Federal Government that will be standards for all interstate commerce. If you stop there, you leave the inspection force of each State to live up to those standards.

Mr. President, I did stop there, and, striking out the numbers of the sections, I shall offer them as an amendment. I would ask, in view of the fact that questions of order concerning amendments containing legislation quite similar have been submitted to the Senate, that I be accorded at least that courtesy. Though the Chair may differ from me as to whether or not it is general legislation, and there is no question about the authority of the Chair to refuse to submit the question to the Senate, it would gratify me if the Chair would do so in this particular instance; and I will then take no further time.

I offer as an amendment sections 5, 6, and 7 of the old bill, striking out the numbers of the sections.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment has been read, and the point of order, the Chair understands, has been made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. There is a very easy way to overrule the Chair, and that is by appealing from the decision of the Chair. The Chair has heretofore expressed the opinion as to similar amendments that they were general legislation and subject to the point of order. The Chair accordingly sustains the point of order as to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? On that question the Senator from North Dakota asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before the question is put to the Senate, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brady	Johnson	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Jones	Page	Smoot
Bryan	Kenyon	Reed	Sterling
Burleigh	Kern	Robinson	Swanson
Chamberlain	Lane	Shafroth	Thornton
Chilton	McCumber	Sheppard	Tillman
Crawford	Martin, Va.	Sherman	Warren
Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.	Weeks
Gore	Nelson	Smith, Md.	West
Hughes	Norris	Smith, Mich.

Mr. THORNTON. I desire to announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN].

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is detained at home on account of illness.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS], and to state that he has a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT].

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. My colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. KERN. I suggest that the names of the absent Senators be called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. SHIVELY, and Mr. THOMPSON responded to their names when called.

Mr. BORAH, Mr. CLAPP, Mr. LEA of Tennessee, and Mr. SHIELDS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. WEST. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. KERN. I hope the Senator will not press that motion at this time.

Mr. WEST. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. McCUMBER. What is the motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 17, noes 17.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair votes "no," and the Senate refuses to adjourn. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the instructions of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in the interest of the public business, I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am surprised that the Senator should have made that motion. It is out of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. I withdraw the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would have to sustain the point of order against the motion.

Mr. GALLINGER. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. LEE of Maryland entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. KERN. I ask that the order directing the Sergeant at Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators be vacated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KERN. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] presented an amendment to the bill, which, upon a point of order being raised, the Chair decided to be not in order. From this ruling the Senator from North Dakota has appealed. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. REED. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KENYON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 20, in lines 18 and 19, it is proposed to strike out the words and figures "and for farm demonstration work, $400,000," and insert "$250,000," so that, if amended, it will read:

To investigate and encourage the adoption of improved methods of farm management and farm practice, $250,000.

It is also proposed to insert, after the word "stock" in line 22, page 20, the following:

For farm-demonstration work outside of the cotton belt, $400,000.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if the bill can not go over until to-morrow. It will take some 15 or 20 minutes in any event to explain this amendment, though I shall be very brief in explaining it. I should prefer, however, to have the matter go over.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that the $400,000 included in the bill is for demonstration work outside of the cotton belt.

Mr. KENYON. My very purpose is to show that that statement, as I view it, is not correct; and I am merely trying to accomplish the object which the Senator says the bill does accomplish. If it did, I should not press the amendment; but I expect to show that the farm-demonstration work outside of the cotton belt is limited to about $138,000. I think the House added a little more, so that it runs up to $170,000. I want to differentiate the items that are included in the appropriation of $400,000 and give them their proper place under the appropriation of $250,000 and then leave the appropriation of $400,000 for farm-demonstration work.

It will require, being as brief as I can be, some 15 or 20 minutes, and I wish the Senator from Oklahoma would not press the matter to-night. I will go ahead, however, if he insists.

Mr. GORE. I understand that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] desires to move an executive session.

Mr. KERN. We desire to have a brief executive session.

Mr. GORE. I therefore yield to the Senator from Indiana.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 56 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 20, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 19, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Bring us, we pray Thee, our Father in heaven, by Thy holy influence, into harmony with the great eternal plan that with clear minds, strong hearts, and willing hands we may work together with Thee for the final consummation of good. That Thy kingdom may indeed come in every heart and Thy will be done to the honor and glory of Thy holy name. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present to the House Judge C. C. HARRIS, of Alabama, who has been elected without opposition to succeed the late Representative Richardson from the eighth district of Alabama, to fill the vacancy caused by Judge Richardson's death. Judge HARRIS was elected last Monday without any opposition, but his credentials have not yet arrived. I ask unanimous consent that he may take the oath of office now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama states that Judge HARRIS, successor to Judge Richardson, is present; that he was elected without opposition from the eighth Alabama district; and that his credentials have not yet arrived; and he asks that he be allowed now to take the oath of office. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARRIS appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office required by law.

THOMAS B. M'CLINTIC.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 661) for the relief of the widow of Thomas B. McClintic, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill 661 and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. POU, Mr. DIES, and Mr. MOTT.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. ROGERS, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for one week, on account of the serious illness of his father.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. 3886. An act to repeal sections 2588, 2589, and 2590 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

CONDITIONS IN COLORADO.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a copy of a joint resolution adopted by the Colorado Legislature, approved May 15, 1914, with reference to conditions existing in that State growing out of the strike. In view of the statements that have been made on the floor of the House I would like to have this resolution printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MADDEN. What does the resolution say?

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I will have them read if the gentleman desires

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD certain resolutions passed by the Colorado Legislature relating to the strike in Colorado.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if these resolutions refer directly to remarks made on the floor of the House?

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. They refer to conditions in the public mind, not only in Colorado but elsewhere throughout the country, which have grown out of remarks made on conditions in that State, some of which have been made, I have no doubt, on the floor of the House.

Mr. BARNHART. Is the gentleman sure that remarks have been made on the floor of the House?

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I am not sure; but I am satisfied there have been.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, until the gentleman can give us an assurance that the resolutions are the result of remarks made on the floor of the House I shall object.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

S. 5066. An act to increase the authorization for a public building at Osage City, Kans.;

S. 5552. An act to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of Gordon W. Nelson," approved May 9, 1914;

S. 65. An act to amend an act entitled "An act providing that the State of Wyoming be permitted to relinquish to the United States certain lands heretofore selected and to select other lands from the public domain in lieu thereof," approved April 12, 1910; and

S. J. Res. 139. Joint resolution to authorize the President to grant leave of absence to an officer of the Corps of Engineers for the purpose of accepting an appointment under the Government of China on works of conservation and public improvement.

WARNING SIGNALS FOR VESSELS WORKING ON WRECKS.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the House passed the Senate bill 5289 to provide for warning signals for vessels working on wrecks, and so forth, and corrected the title. There were two amendments to correct the title and they were both wrong. The bill relates to the amendment to an act approved June 7, 1897, the title as amended providing either for an amendment to an act approved June 7, 1897, or June 27, 1890, it is impossible to tell which. I ask to have the title corrected so that it will be to amend an act approved June 7, 1897.

In the first amendment adopted in the House yesterday to strike out the language which appears in lines 3 and 4 of the bill reported to the House, the language stricken out should have been "marking a wreck or," and there should have been inserted as a part of the amendment at the end of the amendment the word "by." I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the bill was passed may be reconsidered, and the bill returned to a second reading so that these corrections may be made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks to vacate the proceedings on the bill S. 5289 back to the amendment stage. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the amendment which was agreed to corrected; to strike out the language proposed to be stricken out by the first amendment, "marking a wreck or," and that there be added to the amendment agreed to at the end the word "by."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the words "marking a wreck or" be stricken out and that the word "by" be inserted at the end of the amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "June 7, 1897."

STANDARD OIL.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the influence of Standard Oil in the midcontinental oil field.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of influence of the Standard Oil in the midcontinental oil field. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RURAL CREDITS.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of rural credits.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of rural credits. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CONTRIBUTION FOR POLITICAL PURPOSES.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I call up House resolution 256. On last Friday I asked unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, but I notice that the request was not put by the Speaker. I now renew that request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the resolution. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution by title.

The Clerk read the resolution by title, as follows:

Resolution (H. Res. 256) providing for the appointment of a committee to investigate and report whether any Members have been guilty of violating the provisions of the Criminal Code by soliciting contributions for political purposes, etc.

The SPEAKER. On last Friday, just before the House adjourned, the gentleman from Missouri moved the previous question, and the question now is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on striking out the original resolution and inserting.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the resolution may be reported, as there were not many Members in the House on Friday afternoon.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the resolution is somewhat long, and as the substitute is what we are voting on I ask that the substitute be read.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I take it this would require only the reading of the original resolution at this time, and not the preamble.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Very well, Mr. Speaker, with that understanding, I do not object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the Mann resolution and then the Rucker substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of seven Members shall be appointed by the Speaker to investigate and report to this House whether any Members of this House have been guilty of violating any of the provisions of the Criminal Code by soliciting or receiving or by being in any manner concerned in soliciting or receiving any assessment, subscription, or contribution for any political purpose whatever from any person receiving any salary or compensation from moneys derived from the Treasury of the United States, and particularly from Members of this House, to the end that it may be ascertained whether the Members of this House, constituting in part the law making branch of the Government, are above the law.

Substitute:

Resolved, That it is no violation of section 118 of the Criminal Code of the United States for a Senator or Member of the House to solicit or receive assessments or contributions for political purposes from other Senators or Members of the House.

Resolved, That it is no violation of section 119 of the Criminal Code of the United States for a Senator or Member of the House to solicit contributions for political purposes, from other Senators or Members of the House, by letters written in his office in the Senate or House Office Building.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute which the committee reported to strike out the original resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RUCKER) there were—ayes 71, noes 44.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays; and pending that, as a matter of convenience to the Members, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 178, nays 80, answered "present" 22, not voting, 154, as follows:

The name of Mr. GLASS was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the resolution as amended.

The question was taken, and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. RUCKER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amended resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 521 (H. Rept. 687).

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration, in the order named, of the following bills, to wit:

1. H. R. 15613. "To create an interstate trade commission." The first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with, and there shall be not exceeding six hours of general debate on the bill, to be equally divided between those who favor and those who oppose the same, one-half of such time to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] and the other half by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY]. At the conclusion of such general debate the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. After the bill shall have been perfected in the Committee of the Whole, the same shall be laid aside with such recommendations as the committee may make.

2. H. R. 15657. "To supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies." The first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with, and there shall not be exceeding 16 hours of general debate, to be equally divided between those who favor and those who oppose the same, one half of such time to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] and the other half by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD]. At the conclusion of such general debate the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule and only the substitute reported by the Judiciary Committee shall be read. After the bill shall have been perfected in the Committee of the Whole the same shall be laid aside with such recommendation as the committee may make.

3. H. R. 16586. "To amend section 20 of an act to regulate commerce, etc." The first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with and there shall be not exceeding 10 hours of general debate, to be divided equally between those who favor and those who oppose the bill, one half of such time to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] and the other half by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS]. At the conclusion of such general debate the bill shall be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. After the bill shall have been perfected in the Committee of the Whole the same shall be laid aside with such recommendations as the committee may make.

At the conclusion of the consideration of the three bills above specified in the Committee of the Whole the committee shall rise and report the same to the House in the order named, whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon each of said bills and amendments thereto separately as to each bill and in the order named to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit on each of said bills.

The order of business provided by this resolution shall be the continuing order of business of the House until concluded, except that it shall not interfere with Calendar Wednesday, nor with the consideration of H. R. 16508, the further urgent deficiency bill, nor with the consideration of conference reports on appropriation bills or the sending of appropriation bills to conference. All debate shall be confined to the subject matter then under consideration, and all Members speaking upon said bill shall have the right to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD, and all Members shall have the right to print remarks on said bill during not exceeding five legislative days.

During the continuance of this order of business, except on Wednesdays, the House shall meet each day at 11 o'clock a. m. And while the general debate is in progress the House shall recess at not later than 5.30 p. m. until 8 o'clock p. m., when it shall reconvene and continue in session until not later than 11 o'clock p. m.

The SPEAKER. Before this debate begins, the Chair lays before the House the following personal requests.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi requests leave of absence indefinitely, on account of serious illness in his family.

Mr. ESTOPINAL requests leave of absence indefinitely, on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the requests will be granted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. I hope it will not embarrass the Speaker; and my request is as to whether, if this rule be adopted in the form it is, such matters as this can be presented to the House before all of these bills are finally voted upon? I notice the rule says it shall be a continuing order except——

Mr. HENRY. To what matters does the gentleman refer?

The SPEAKER. What is it the gentleman asks?

Mr. MANN. Well, leaves of absence and things of that sort, as to whether it will interfere with matters upon the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. Oh, no; it would not interfere with personal requests; it would interfere with all other business except things like that. Of course, the Chair would have to be governed by common sense.

Mr. HENRY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] how much time he would like for discussion of the rule.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I think we can get on with a half an hour on this side if an agreement can be reached for that amount of time.

Mr. HENRY. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will state to the gentleman I have just had some additional requests, and if the gentleman will make it five more minutes that would be more acceptable.

Mr. HENRY. Well, say an hour and ten minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. HENRY. I have no objection to making it 35 minutes on each side. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this rule extend for 1 hour and 10 minutes, and at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the rule, the time to be equally divided between the two sides.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I am quite willing the previous question shall be then submitted to the House, but it might develop that some one wanted to offer an amendment and the House might not want to order the previous question.

Mr. HENRY. Well, I do not believe anyone would want to offer an amendment to the rule, but, of course, I will move the previous question at the end of that time, and that will be the understanding.

Mr. MANN. I am perfectly willing for the gentleman to have the right to move the previous question at the end of that time.

Mr. HENRY. If that is the agreement and understanding——

The SPEAKER. Now, what is the agreement? The Chair does not want to get it wrong.

Mr. HENRY. That the debate on the rule shall not exceed 1 hour and 10 minutes, 35 minutes of which time to be controlled by myself and 35 minutes by the gentleman from Kansas, and at the end of that time that I be recognized to move the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Before the Chair puts that he wants to answer more fully the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois. The Chair thinks that during this lapse of time in which these bills are to be debated all such things as personal requests, sending bills to conference, taking bills from the Speaker's table with Senate amendments, and so forth, where it does not take too long, ought to be attended to——

Mr. MANN. I do not know how that would be determined.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker might determine it with the consent of the House.

Mr. HENRY. Is there anything in this resolution which forbids the Speaker when the committee rises each afternoon or night from submitting these personal requests?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. MANN. There would be if anybody asked for the regular order.

Mr. GARNER. That would be equivalent to an objection, anyway.

The SPEAKER. Everybody in the House knows very frequently there are matters that do not take more than a minute or two to transact, but which are of a good deal of importance to some particular Member, but, of course, if the Chair believes something is going to take two or three hours, he will refuse to recognize them.

Mr. MACDONALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. Let us have this agreement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks that debate on this rule be limited to 1 hour and 10 minutes, 35 minutes of that time to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas and 35 minutes by himself. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HENRY. And the understanding and agreement is, of course, that at the end of that time I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Well, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas when this debate is over to move the previous question.

Mr. HENRY. I now yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MACDONALD. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY], who is the Progressive member of the committee and to whom time is assigned, is not here, and probably will not be here during this debate.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, let us presume Mr. LAFFERTY will return by the time the rule is adopted, and after we have adopted it if the gentleman does not return it will be time to take up the matter——

Mr. MACDONALD. I would like to make sure about that, as I understand debate will begin immediately on this matter.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield? The gentleman from Michigan referred to the gentleman from Oregon as the Progressive member of the committee. He has just been a candidate for Congress on the Republican ticket. How does the gentleman know he is now a Progressive?

Mr. MACDONALD. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] I do not know if he is a Progressive now, but I do know that he was put on this committee to represent the Progressive Members of this House.

Mr. MANN. In the Directory he has always put himself in as a Republican and never as a Progressive.

Mr. GARNER. What was the result of this conglomeration in which he has recently been a candidate?

Mr. MANN. All I saw was in the daily press.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], who will explain the provisions of this special rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the resolution which has been offered is very clear in its terms, and it seems to me explains itself. It provides an order of business which will be the continuing order until concluded, not to interfere with certain matters therein specifically mentioned. It provides that the trade commission bill shall be first considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, that there shall be not exceeding six hours of general debate, to be equally divided between those favoring and those opposing the bill, the time to be controlled one half by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] and the other half by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY], who was the minority member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce making a minority report in opposition to the bill. At the conclusion of the general debate the bill will be read for amendment in the usual way under the five-minute rule and perfected in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and will then be laid aside with such recommendations as the committee shall make concerning it.

Following that, the bill H. R. 15657, supplementing existing law against unlawful restraints and monopolies, will be taken up for consideration. On that there are 16 hours of general debate, to be equally divided between those favoring and those opposing, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], the chairman of the committee, and the other half by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], the ranking member on the Republican side. At the conclusion of that this bill also is to be read for amendment, with no limitation upon amendment, and after being perfected it will be laid aside with such recommendation as the committee may make.

Mr. GARNER and Mr. GARDNER rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will first yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER. This bill is the Clayton antitrust bill, is it not?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is.

Mr. GARDNER. And is at present on the House Calendar and not on the Union Calendar?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee It is.

Mr. GARDNER. And if it were not for this proposed special rule any amendments which might be offered to that bill would be subject to a yea-and-nay vote, would they not?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Probably.

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly. Would they not be considered in the House?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Under the general rules of the House; yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Under the general rules; yes. But by this special rule as drawn you have arranged it so that the amendments to that Clayton antitrust bill will not be voted on by a yea-and-nay vote unless they are lumped together with other things in one single motion to recommit. Is that correct?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is one effect of it.

Mr. GARNER. Provided, of course, the amendments are not adopted in the Committee of the Whole, but adopted by the House.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman said amendments that were adopted. Of course any amendment reported back to the House would be voted on in the House.

Mr. GARNER. What is the object of laying these bills aside when perfected and retaining them until they must be voted on at one time after general debate and perfection of each bill?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is a part of the program to carry them through as rapidly as possible.

Mr. GARNER. Then why not send the bills to the Senate as fast as we can perfect them. For instance, when the first bill is disposed of why not send it to the Senate and thereby hasten final legislation on it and adjournment of the Congress?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The only answer that I can make to the gentleman from Texas touching that is that that question was submitted in committee, and after very full consideration it was determined by a majority of the committee that this plan would be better in expediting public business.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. If the plan suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] is adopted, is it probable that we could get through and adjourn quicker if we do not permit the Senate to consider them until all three are considered? The object of this program, as I understand it, is to finish this program as quickly as possible and adjourn. Is it not a fact that if we take two days to pass this trade-commission bill and a week to pass the trust bill, and another week to pass the other bill, that it would then be two or three weeks or four weeks before the Senate could begin the consideration of any one of these bills?

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, if they wait two or three weeks before getting the bills they will expedite the matters a good deal more. Is not that it?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course it is a matter of judgment.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is not the gentleman's judgment that the other plan would expedite the consideration of these bills in the other body, where they must be considered before they become a law? I will ask the gentleman's judgment upon it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman's judgment—oh, well, perhaps my individual judgment is not important. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. So that the House may have a clear understanding of this provision of continuing in recess from 5.30 p. m. until 8 p. m., when the House is considering these bills under general debate, I would like to ask whether if general debate is not concluded at 5.30 and runs over after 8 o'clock, and is concluded at some time between 8 and 11 p. m., whether then the House of its own force will adjourn or take up the consideration under the five-minute rule until the hour of adjournment? For instance, you begin the consideration of the first bill at about 3 o'clock. There will be two or three hours of general debate this afternoon and two hours and a half this evening, and maybe more, but before 11 o'clock comes the general debate will have been concluded. What is the purpose then—to adjourn pro forma, or will we immediately proceed to the consideration under the five-minute rule?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that I think that will rest with the Committee of the Whole. The only purpose that the Committee on Rules had in mind in connection with that was to insure a night session, in so far as it could, for general debate.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman believe that we should give these weighty and important bills consideration under the five-minute rule in the evening session? I take it that the purpose of the committee was only to provide means in the evening sessions for general debate, and when the time for general debate expires in the evening the committee would rise until the following morning at 11 o'clock.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The rule says the committee shall sit not later than 11 p. m. On the question of whether or not they shall consider these weighty bills at the night session under the five-minute rule, it will depend on the feeling and wish of the House or the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the construction of the rule? It will bear one construction, namely, that only general debate will be considered at the evening session. The House ought to know, so that it will know what it is consenting to when it votes to consider these bills from 11 o'clock in the morning until 5.30 in the afternoon, and then from 8 o'clock in the evening until 11 o'clock at night. That would be a very exhaustive service.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. So far as the rule is concerned it only provides for evening sessions during the general debate.

Mr. GARNER. It is very important that the gentleman's construction of this rule should be thoroughly understood, because the question might come up in the Committee of the Whole at the night session, if a point of order was made that you could not consider the amendments under the five-minute rule at that hour, because this is provided only for general debate. As I understand, the proceedings of the Committee of the Whole are to be confined to general debate at the night session. That is a matter that will come up in Committee of the Whole very likely if a point of order is made against it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The only compulsory thing as to evening sessions is that if a quorum is present during general debate it shall sit until 11 o'clock at night. If there should not be a quorum present, of course the committee would have to rise. But it does not prevent the Committee of the Whole from considering the bills under the five-minute rule if it chooses to do so.

Mr. STAFFORD. At the evening session?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. At the evening session.

Mr. GARNER. It is well that that should be understood.

Mr. MANN. If the general debate should be concluded in the afternoon on one of these bills, there would be no evening session that night? Is not the rule clear about that?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Undoubtedly. Of course, the House itself could fix the time. But so far as the rule is concerned, the rule itself would not compel an evening session except for purposes of general debate.

Mr. GARNER. That is the point; that is all right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HOUSTON). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] use some of his time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] is recognized.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, this rule is another evidence of the desperate political situation in which this administration and the Democratic Party now find themselves.

You are legislating now by special rule. This resolution makes in order under one rule three of the "five brothers." Of course, everybody knows that neither one of these bills will become a law during this session of Congress. That is the announced policy, well understood at both ends of the Capitol and quite as well understood at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue. But for some reason it is insisted that all these bills shall be made in order in one rule and rushed through the House. Is some one trying to save his face or make pretense before the country that something of importance is being transacted? A few days ago you did not think your condition so desperate, and only made two separate bills in order in one rule.

But the manner in which you do business, while bad, is not as bad as the result of the business you do. You have been in power now 1 year 2 months and 15 days, and your record reads like an obituary.

You have paralyzed and prostrated industries of every kind; you have reduced wages and the employment of labor; you have made business and enterprise of every kind uncertain and hazardous; you have reduced the value of the industrial and transportation properties of the country over $10,000,000,000; you have cut the value of farm property one-fourth. Men engaged in the productive enterprises of our own country stand idle while others engaged in similar enterprises in foreign countries are supplying our market. The farmers find the products of other countries in the market which they have supplied during the entire period of our country's history. It would be impossible to exaggerate the demoralized conditions into which you have thrown our domestic affairs.

Our condition at home is discouraging and depressing to laboring men and business men in every section of our country.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I regret I can not yield now. Conditions at home are bad, but you have humiliated and made us ridiculous in the face of the world by your foreign policy—or, perhaps, I should say by your want of a foreign policy.

You are surrendering our right to control our own affairs in Panama to England and other nations that may claim any rights there. You are giving to Colombia greater rights in the use of the Panama Canal than you assert for the people of our own country, and giving that country $25,000,000 as a gratuity, and besides making an abject apology for taking the steps that made the construction of the canal possible.

Overnight you plunged the country into a war with Victoriano Huerta, an unrecognized assassin in Mexico, on a matter of mere punctilio, because of the difference in the offer of a salute of 5 guns and the demand of a salute of 21.

Oh, of course, you as individuals are not less concerned about the common welfare than those who disagree with you in politics. You are not less patriotic than others. You are simply incompetent to manage the affairs of a Nation so great as ours.

Your policies, while attractive in theory, can not be made to work out in practice.

There has not been such a deplorable condition in our country since you were in full power 16 years ago.

You may adopt this rule, make these three bills in order, and pass them through the House, and it is safe to say that they will aggravate rather than relieve the conditions in which your other acts have placed us.

There is not as much big business to assail as there was when you began. If you keep on there will be none to complain of.

Then, too, this rule also enables you further to repudiate the Baltimore platform. It enables you to surrender State government of local industries to Federal control. There is now nothing in the political world so obsolete as the Baltimore platform. It promised to speed business; you have retarded it. It promised to increase employment and wages; you have diminished both. It promised to increase exports; you have reduced them. It promised to increase revenues; you have reduced a surplus to a deficit. It promised to make living better and cheaper; you have done neither.

No doubt these are some of the reasons why you are rejecting and repudiating your platform.

But the lamentable and discouraging situation that confronts the country to-day is the fact that there yet remains two years nine months and fifteen days before the people can rid themselves of the latest exhibition of Democratic incompetency in the management of our Government. It seems a long time.

However, the people will give you the customary two years' notice to move on the third day of November next, by electing a Republican House of Representatives. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The trouble is your policies are wrong, and incidentally you just do not know how to run the country. [Applause on the Republican side.] Nobody knows better than you do that what I am saying is true. Why, the manner in which you are attempting to shape up your affairs to present to your constituents when you go home would be amusing if it was not so pathetic. You can not explain it to them. You gentlemen who assailed President Taft for surrendering to Canada in the reciprocity treaty will have some difficulty in explaining to your farmer constituents when you go home why it was that you surrendered to Canada everything that was given by reciprocity and more and got nothing in return. It is now stated by shrewd Canadian statesmen that they engineered the repudiation of Canadian reciprocity for the sole purpose of getting a better deal out of you when you came into power. They got it, and that is but another evidence of your incapacity and incompetency to manage the affairs of the Nation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I consumed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has consumed 17 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman to consume the balance of his time, as there will be only one more speech on this side.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I beg the pardon of the House for reading a short extract from a publication issued a couple of years ago, which a large number of those who voted for it seem to be ignoring entirely, and it looks as though the whole party would like to see the thing sent to the everlasting "demnition bow-wows." Of course, everybody recognizes that I am speaking of the Baltimore platform—molasses to catch flies. When you were patting yourselves upon the back as to what you had done in the last Congress you said:

It—

Referring to the House—

has, among other achievements, revised the rules of the House of Representatives so as to give the Representatives of the American people freedom of speech and of action in advocating, proposing, and perfecting remedial justice.

You have forgotten all about that.

Mr. SLOAN. No; but they would like to.

Mr. PAYNE. You have been bringing in rule after rule here for the purpose of curtailing the freedom of action of the House and of the Members of the House, and cutting down debate. You have transferred your deliberations to the caucus room and the committee-room building, and to the executive chamber, and you have no freedom of action in the House. Whenever you want to bring up a measure that you deem important, you call a caucus and get the gentlemen together upon the subject, if possible, and when you get in there you tell them a certain gentleman at the other end of the Avenue wants this and does not want that, and that seems to go with the caucus. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Why, the last bill you had here of a general character was a bill having more importance in the future and for years to come perhaps than any other bill you will consider. That was the bill to repeal the tolls exemption; and not merely that, but to give up to foreign nations our control of a property that cost $400,000,000, a property that will have more influence on the future commerce of the world than any other great property ever owned by any nation. And when you came in with a rule for the consideration of that bill, it provided that there should not be any amendment to the immortal Sims bill; and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] said, "Why, it is so good a bill, so well drawn, that it can not be amended." So we were left without any privilege of amending that bill here in the House. It has gone over to another place where they do deliberate; and in these latter days I thank God that there is a legislative body in the United States that does deliberate and consider, and they propose to amend that bill to try to save the cowardly surrender of this canal to foreign powers by your administration and by yourselves. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The other day the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]—I am sorry to say I do not see him in his seat—on the 14th of this month used this significant language in debate on this floor:

The people of the United States are not clamoring so much for legislation to-day as they are for an opportunity to do business. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 14, p. 9345.)

The people of the United States have had enough of your kind of legislation. I am glad the gentleman from Alabama realizes it. Why, I have been advising some of you gentlemen individually what you had better do for the good of the Democratic Party, and especially for the good of the country—that is, to pass the appropriation bills and adjourn, and go home without doing any further injury—and I find that the most of you agree with me personally; and I have understood from the newspapers that the members of these committees who have reported these bills would not have brought them in here to-day and asked for a vote on them except for the orders that came from the other end of the Avenue. According to the telegrams in the papers of last Saturday, our optimistic President seems to have caught the fever from the Secretary of Commerce, as published in the Associated Press reports, that we were on the eve of the greatest revival of business the world has ever seen. We have been on that eve now ever since the 3d day of October. Our worthy Speaker prophesied it due in December. The Secretary of State, a little more careful, said he saw the rainbow of promise of prosperity in the sky along in January. Latterly you have fallen back upon the prediction of the Secretary of Agriculture, that we are going to have a bumper crop in this country that will make everybody rich and happy, and that, too, before half the crop is sown in the United States. [Laughter.] Half of the area in the United States to-day is not planted because of the prevailing rain and moisture. But you are going to have a magnificent crop.

Now, you are young in these matters. If you stop to think, when you have bumper crops prices are lower and the farmers do not have any more money to spend. That is not going to help you out.

You were going to increase the foreign trade under the Underwood tariff bill, because you said you can not hope to sell unless we buy. I had something to do with the tariff bill that has been berated for four years, up to the time my friend UNDERWOOD came along with his bill, amended from the White House. Since then it has been different; my bill has become popular. Under it we made the greatest progress in the markets of the world ever made by any people. [Applause on the Republican sire.] It is so marvelous that the Secretary of Commerce can not help talking about it.

I am anxious for you to do better. I want you to improve on what you have done. The very best you can do is to adjourn. You have done enough already, God knows, to throw you into oblivion the first time that the people can get at you; but I want to save what little you have left for the people of the United States.

What kind of a record have you made in the markets of the world? I have the statistics here, the last one for April from the Secretary of Commerce, who gives out the statistics for publication month by month, and what is the record? Why, ever since you put that bill on the statute books eight months ago your exports have been decreasing month by month in geometrical ratio.

The balance of trade was against us under the Walker tariff and the tariffs that followed. It was against us under the first Wilson bill, while under all Republican tariffs it has been in our favor. It was so during every month of the law of 1909. The annual exports exceeded the imports by hundreds of millions. We were getting European gold to settle the balance. But never was there such a tremendous export of manufactured articles from any country as from ours under the last Republican tariff.

Your bill has been in operation since October 3, 1913. Here are the figures showing the balance of trade for the seven full months up to the 1st of May, as compared with the corresponding months of the previous year.

Monthly excess of exports.

	Fiscal year 1913 (Payne law).	Fiscal year 1914 (Underwood law).
October	$76,645,000	$138,976,000
November	127,000,000	97,000,000
December	96,000,000	49,000,000
January	64,000,000	10,000,000
February	44,000,000	26,000,000
March	32,000,000	5,000,000
April	53,600,000	[1] 10,271,372

[1] Excess of imports

Your tariff was not in full operation in October and the balance of trade was $139,000,000. This dwindled to $5,000,000 in March, and was wiped out in April, with a balance of over $10,000,000 against us.

You ought, in view of your record, to let up on the American people and give them a rest. Do not put the antitrust laws into litigation for another 10 years. Enforce them as they are.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, when we were in power, many a time have I heard the Democratic side of the House criticize us for our special rules. We never did anything so improper as that which the Democratic members of the Rules Committee propose. They have taken this Clayton antitrust bill from its place on the House Calendar, where there would be a yea-and-nay vote on each one of the labor amendments, and they propose to tuck it away in the Committee of the Whole House, where there can not be a record vote. Instead of being exposed to the cold, cold hillside of a yea-and-nay vote, Members are to be cloistered in the careful seclusion of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, where the exasperating record vote is unknown.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is not as if the Clayton antitrust bill were really a Union Calendar bill. It is not a Union Calendar bill. It is a House Calendar bill. It is now on the House Calendar, and that means that Members could demand a yea-and-nay vote on every amendment if it were not for the reprehensible way in which this proposed special rule is drawn.

To be sure, the Covington and the Rayburn bills are properly on the Union Calendar, but this Clayton antitrust bill has been deliberately taken from its position, where it would be subject to a yea-and-nay vote, and has been tucked away into Committee of the Whole, where no record vote can be had on these amendments or on any others.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to conceal my position. I propose to vote against the amendment which declares that antitrust laws shall not apply to labor unions and to certain other organizations, and I intend to vote in favor of the other amendment proposed by labor. I mean to vote for the amendment which proposes to make lawful certain actions against which the issuance of injunctions is forbidden by this bill. If the House votes down the previous question on this rule, I shall propose an amendment providing that the Clayton antitrust bill shall be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Then we shall have yea-and-nay votes whenever necessary.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield? The gentleman from Massachusetts does not have any doubt but that there will be a record vote on that proposition?

Mr. GARDNER. I have very great doubt on the subject: whether the amendments are adopted or rejected. There is only one motion to recommit provided, and on that motion the Speaker must accord recognition to some gentleman who says that he is opposed to the bill. The gentleman who is opposed to the bill may move to recommit with a very different proposition than either one of these labor amendments.

Now, a motion to recommit can comprise both of these amendments, or it may comprise half a dozen other things; but there can be only one motion to recommit. The chances are that, under the rules, recognition will be accorded to somebody who will make a motion to recommit, which will not comprise either of these labor propositions. If that proves to be the case there will be no yea-and-nay vote on either of them, whether they are adopted or rejected in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Mann. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have two especial criticisms to make of this rule There are others. First, we are passing a rule in order to consider these bills speedily, so that they may be sent over to the Senate at an early date. Then, why do we not vote on each bill in the House and pass it as we finish it in Committee of the Whole? Can anybody tell me that? We take up the interstate trades commission bill, finish it in the Committee of the Whole, and lay it aside. Why do we not pass it then, or vote on it in the House? We take up the Clayton antitrust bill, consider it in Committee of the Whole, and lay it aside. Why do we not vote on it then, if we want to hasten action in the Senate, and send it over to the Senate? But under this rule we wait until we are through with all the bills before we vote upon any of them in the House. Can any distinguished Democrat tell me why? I will be very glad to have the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] tell why, when we are in a hurry to pass the bills, we delay final action upon them. It would not take any longer to pass these bills in the House at the time we have considered and reported each to the House than it will when they are all reported back in a bunch, because it will take a separate roll call, if one is asked, on each bill, and there may be a motion to recommit on each bill. It is one of those curiosities of legislative performance which emanates from some unknown source. I suppose they had the orders from the White House. They dare not pass these bills one ahead of the other. In the end one must be voted upon in the House ahead of the other, but if we are in a hurry, when we get through with the interstate trade commission bill in the committee, why not report that bill back to the House and dispose of it at once?

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, will my colleague allow me to——

Mr. MANN. No; I do not believe the gentleman represents his side of the House, or I should. I have not the time anyway. There is no one else on the gentleman's side of the House who is in accord with the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LEVY. The people are. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. The people are in accord with the gentleman from New York on one thing, and that is that the people believe, like he, that the Democrats are not capable of running the Government.

Mr. LEVY. Oh, no; I am a Democrat.

Mr. MANN. I do not yield further. I have one other criticism, Mr. Speaker, and that is the same one made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MANN. I have not the time.

Mr. GARDNER. I meant to say that we had talked this over beforehand.

Mr. MANN. Oh, that is unnecessary. The gentleman from Massachusetts is watching everything in respect to the rules and legislation and parliamentary law as closely as any man who ever came into the House.

Mr. Speaker, there are two classes of public bills in this House, one that goes to the Union Calendar and one that goes to the House Calendar. Union Calendar bills are perfected in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, where amendments are offered in committee and no roll call can be had upon them. House Calendar bills are perfected in the House, sitting as the House. Where an amendment is offered to a House Calendar bill, a roll call can be had upon it. The Clayton antitrust bill is a House Calendar bill. In this bill, as reported from the committee, there is a committee substitute, or one amendment for all of the provisions of the bill, and when the bill is reported back to the House it will be as a committee substitute, which is one amendment. There can be no separate vote when this bill is reported back to the House on any amendment which is offered to amend the committee amendment. It will be reported back as one amendment. The bill contains this provision:

> That nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of fraternal, labor, consumers', agricultural, or horticultural organizations—

And so forth.

Some gentlemen desire to change that to provide that nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall apply to these organizations.

If that amendment was acted upon under the ordinary rules of the House on a House bill, gentlemen for or against the amendment could have a roll call on the amendment, but under this peculiar rule, the first of the kind that has ever been brought into the House in the history of the House, to consider a House Calendar bill in Committee of the Whole House, you can offer 40 amendments, vote them up or down, and there will be no chance for a roll call upon any one of them, and there is no opportunity for a roll call upon this proposition or any similar proposition. You on the Democratic side of the House will escape being placed personally on record on each of these amendments, but the country and the people who are interested will hold you responsible, because you have violated the rules of the House, because you are afraid personally to record yourselves on this amendment. [Applause on the Republican side.] And it is pure cowardice of which you are guilty. You have changed the rules which authorize a record vote in order to escape a record vote. There is one thing I thank myself for. I think I am not a coward. [Applause on Republican side.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have 25 minutes remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman begins his argument, I will ask him to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. HENRY. Very well.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY] mentioned in the rule as entitled to control the time on the other side is absent. I consulted gentlemen on the other side, both members of the Progressive Party and members of the Republican Party, and I find that they can agree over there, and they are all willing to trust the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS]. I ask the gentleman from Texas to obtain unanimous consent to substitute the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] for the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY].

Mr. HENRY. There will be no objection to that later on. I hope this will not be taken out of my time.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; Mr. Speaker, there seems to have been a misunderstanding on this side. It was understood by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] that he was to have five minutes. In some way, through a misunderstanding, his colleague is not able to yield it to him. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kansas may have five minutes.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I will yield the gentleman five minutes myself.

Mr. MANN. We all thank the gentleman for his courtesy.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I particularly thank the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there is a man here who will ever face on domestic legislation a graver moment than this. This is the beginning of another attempt on the part of the Government to handle the trust proposition.

The matter should have come in early in the session; it has come in at the end of the session, and, as was to be expected in a matter of this kind, another special rule has been invoked. The rule is carefully guarded. So far as the provision for general debate is concerned I think it is liberal, but great care is taken to give only one motion to recommit on each of the bills and no opportunity is afforded the membership of the House to have any separate vote upon the amendments in the bill itself. Now there are three political parties in the House, and those three parties have distinct programs. The Democrats have come forward with the administration measures. The Republicans, as usual, are not in accord in their views. The Republican members of the committee disagree in their reports.

The Progressives do have a constructive plan for trust legislation drawn with great care and put forward with great enthusiasm and sincerity. Under this special rule one or the other of the two minority parties is going to be shut out from the right to offer a motion to recommit. That is not right. There ought to be in this rule a provision for two motions to recommit, and the House ought have the right to vote upon separate amendments. Now, I said in the beginning this is a grave moment in the Congress. Twenty-two years ago I was a reporter in Chicago, and my paper sent me down to Ohio to report the first great suit that was brought against the Standard Oil Trust, and a high court solemnly and by final decree at that time dissolved the Standard Oil Trust, and I remember distinctly writing the heading upon my newspaper article 22 years ago to the effect that the Standard Oil Co. had been dissolved. What a record of delay, denial of popular demand, and legal helplessness has transpired since. Futility in the highest court of the land ruling one way in the Knight case and another way in the Northern Securities case. Futility in the Congress of the United States. In the Fiftieth Congress the Committee on the Judiciary in this body reported that there was one further amendment necessary to the Sherman antitrust law to cover the interpretation of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Knight case, a correction that the Supreme Court has since made itself. Futility in the administrative bodies of this Government. Inaction upon the part of prosecutors of the Government, and now, after 24 years, almost a quarter of a century of confessed helplessness on the part of this great Government, we are about to take another step. I am sorry that it is a random step and will be, in my opinion, a futile step. I am sorry that the Covington bill is weak, purely investigative in its powers, born a cripple. I am sorry the Clayton bill persists in the attempt to make this country travel again the old, profitless circle which follows writing rigid inhibition against big business, honest and otherwise, into law and leaving it to the long-lingering delay which waits upon the interpretations of the courts. I think this is a time when we ought to pause and give ear to the significant events of the hour. What fantastic films the morning newspapers reveal before the eyes of the country. Rockefeller, over at Tarrytown, N. Y., installing a system of electric lights that he may keep, by touching a button at his bedside, his eight guards who surround the house awake through the hours of the night. The testimony in Denver yesterday, where witnesses stated before the board of inquiry that in Troop A, which looted the tents of the striking miners at Ludlow after they had shot the miners down and killed 11 women and children, there were only 8 members who were not either mine guards or mine employees. Constitutional government in Colorado has broken down. The man who has been the beneficiary of our delay, of our careless, futile, trust legislation, passed at random——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. Sits in his palace upon the Hudson, insecure, fearful that the law will not protect him, and the men out in Colorado who are his victims know that it does not protect them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, the ceremony seems to be a solemn occasion for gentlemen on that side of the House. I was surprised at the remarks of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]. He ranged all over the legislative domain and really discussed nothing in particular. The gentleman asked why we vote on these bills at the same time. Let me tell the House why we are doing it. There are two good and sufficient reasons why we have pursued that course. In the first place, if we vote upon them at three separate times, the Members would have to be here and be on notice that there were three separate votes. As it is, when we have completed a bill, we lay it aside with whatever recommendation the committee makes, and then we take up the next bill and pursue the same course, and then the remaining bill, and at the end of that time vote on all the bills in accordance with the order in which they are enumerated in the special rule. Is there anything queer or anything wrong about a rule of that sort? The objection made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is an absurdity on that point. Now, another good reason that appealed to some of us was this: We did not care to have one of these bills passed ahead of the others and sent over to the Senate while the antitrust bill was delayed here and perhaps a lot of provisions be incorporated in the trade-commission bill by the Senate, looking to the creation of a commission to investigate interlocking directorates, holding companies, dummy directorates, and things of that sort, so as to postpone the whole antitrust program. We intend to face the questions as they are presented here and to vote upon all of them. Why, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] says we are hurrying these bills through. He must understand that his remark is not justifiable. We have allowed all the time asked on either side of this House for general debate, and then after the general debate is exhausted we take the bills up separately under the five-minute rule and allow unlimited debate and amendment. Gentlemen may proceed, if it takes a week or two weeks, to finish either one of the bills under the five-minute rule.

So this is one of the most liberal rules that has ever been brought into this House.

Next, the gentleman from New York, the Nestor of the House, the distinguished gentleman, Mr. PAYNE, offers a little free advice to the Democratic Party. Let me remind him and his side of the House that he is a very poor adviser, indeed, because he advised his party to vote for the Payne-Aldrich bill, and the Republican Party went upon the rocks in less than six months after its passage. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We do not need his advice, nor do we care for it. And it was, indeed, a pitiable sight to see the gentleman drag before this House and the world the corpse of the old Payne-Aldrich bill that would have been forgotten long ago if it had not been for the oppression and suffering heaped upon the people by the provisions of that infamous measure. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] says, too, that we have taken a bill from the House Calendar and put it upon the Union Calendar, and that we have done it in order to prevent a record vote on certain amendments. Let me warn the gentleman that until he becomes more friendly to the labor organizations of this country we can not profit by any advice from him. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me serve notice on him that when the antitrust bill bearing the name of the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] is up for consideration under the five-minute rule it will be in order to offer amendments without limit and to freely debate them. And let me further advise him that there will be an amendment in plain and clear-cut English language exempting directly and specifically labor organizations and farmers' organizations from the provisions of the antitrust law. We have the votes to put it on in the Committee of the Whole and in the House of Representatives as well. So he need not be alarmed. I am squarely for this Samuel Gompers amendment.

He need not be distressed about this matter. Every Member's vote will be understood in the Committee of the Whole and in the House after the bill is reported there, and he will find that there will be no friend of labor lagging on this side of the House, and we will again write into the law, as we have done several times heretofore, a provision exempting those organizations from the provisions of the antitrust law, as intended when it was passed in 1890.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. HENRY. For a question.

Mr. GARDNER. At what point will there be a yea-and-nay vote on that "apply to" amendment, whether it is adopted or defeated?

Mr. HENRY. Of course there will be a vote in the House on the motion to recommit. The gentleman knows that.

Mr. GARDNER. But suppose some gentleman claims the floor and says he is opposed to the bill. The right to recommit rests with him. Suppose he does not include that amendment in his motion to recommit?

Mr. HENRY. You need not be uneasy. We are not going to let that happen.

Mr. GARDNER. You can not help it.

Mr. HENRY. We can help it and we will help it. We are going to put it on in the committee.

Mr. GARDNER. I shall vote against the "apply to" amendment in the committee, as I have already said. You can not get a yea-and-nay vote on it in the House, because it is an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman knows we can find a plain way to get it on.

Mr. GARDNER. You can not if you adopt it in the committee.

Mr. HENRY. If you are so solicitous about this, you ought to get on the side of these gentlemen and help them put the amendment on. You need not presuppose the Democrats are cowards on this question. And I do not suppose the Members on that side are cowards, because I expect most of you to vote against labor, as you have done heretofore. For more than 20 years the labor organizations of this country stood before the door of this House and before the Speaker's room and urged the passage of such legislation as contained in the Clayton antitrust measure. You and your party spurned their request. You denied them the right to be heard on the floor of this House. But no sooner had the Democracy gone into power in the House of Representatives than we passed those bills which had been suppressed by the distinguished former Speaker, Mr. Cannon, and his official régime that advised and cooperated with him on these matters. They are in this bill, and they are going to remain there, and we are going to vote for them, and intend to give to the labor organizations and the people of this country the laws they have been clamoring for during nearly a quarter of a century. And the program is going through the Senate, and the bills will go to the President, and the Executive that the Democratic voters of this country put in power will give relief to the people. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] may question the sincerity of the President by innuendo and make unjust charges against him, yet I tell him that the American people believe in Woodrow Wilson and know that he is honest and on their side. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. I yield for a question.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman says the program will go through the House, and he seems to be able to speak for the Senate, and now I want to ask him if the President will sign this antitrust bill with that provision for labor in as he describes?

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman knows I have no brief to speak for the President. I am nobody's spokesman here. I am speaking for myself on this occasion, and saying what I believe; and I repeat that all three of these measures will be given to the country which your party deliberately suppressed for many years. We ask the country to test our good faith, and they will find that the Democratic Party has not forsaken them. Ah, gentlemen may prate about these things, but they know that the measures are for the relief of the people, and if they need amendment, come along and help us amend them, aid in making them better. Let me warn you now that if the Republican Party, the stand-pat party, goes back to its idols, the special-privilege class of this country, there will not be enough of you left after the next election to justify calling the roll in the House.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENRY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says that the bill needs amendment. Does the gentleman think the Clayton antitrust bill does need amendment on the matter that relates to the exemption of labor and farmers' organizations?

Mr. HENRY. Yes; I do. I think it needs amendment, and I shall vote and do everything I can to amend it.

Mr. MANN. Then all the gentlemen on that side are not in accord with the gentleman?

Mr. HENRY. I do not know, but we will take care of it. The gentleman from Illinois need not worry. How does he stand on the question?

Mr. MANN. I am not worrying.

Mr. HENRY. Where do you stand?

Mr. MANN. I am in favor of having a roll call on it.

Mr. HENRY. Are you for this amendment?

Mr. MANN. And when you have a roll call, I will vote. I am not afraid to have a roll call.

Mr. HENRY. How will the gentleman vote in the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether it will come up in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HENRY. How do you stand now?

Mr. MANN. How I stand now will depend very largely upon whether I can make more mischief on your side of the House by voting one way or the other. You are all split up the back, and whatever is done we will do.

Mr. HENRY. And you will not tell where you stand?

Mr. MANN. I will not, until the time comes.

Mr. HENRY. You talk about your courage and bravery, and yet you will not say where you stand on this amendment. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. I am quite willing to tell where I stand when it counts. I do not propose to tell the gentleman in advance, because we shall determine on this side of the House what is done with that amendment. You are divided on that side. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HENRY. No; I will tell the gentleman this——

Mr. MANN. And you are afraid over there to go on record.

Mr. HENRY. You are afraid to tell the people before the election where you stand on this question. The gentleman says he loves to make all "the mischief" he can for the Democratic Party.

Mr. MANN. No; I did not; but I will tell the gentleman that I will do it on this occasion.

Mr. HENRY. Now, let me give the gentleman a little friendly advice, because he and I came into the House together in 1896. Let the gentleman from Illinois quit trying to cause "mischief" to the Democratic Party. Let the gentleman vote for the interests of the people, and stand for the people's cause, and then the gentleman will be better off. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, I like the gentleman from Illinois and dislike to be put to the painful necessity of giving him this advice; and yet I was never more sure of doing him a good service than I am now in asking him to accept my advice. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MANN. I shall be sure to be returned if I do not take the advice of the gentleman from Texas. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENRY. If the gentleman had taken my advice since 1897 and followed it, perhaps his party would now be in power, and not the Democratic Party. But we drove you from pillar to post, because you insisted on serving the privileged classes of this country, and your party went down, and it will remain beneath the waves until you get on the people's side. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Until the next election. Then we shall be on top. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HENRY. That is the trouble with these gentlemen, who say they want to have a show and an opportunity to vote on this amendment in the House. The gentleman will have a chance to vote on it in the Committee of the Whole. He will have a chance to vote on all of these measures, and he will have a chance to improve them, if they ought to be improved. That is not the trouble with the gentleman from Illinois. The trouble with him is that these bills are good, and he does not want them passed at all, and if he had his way he would defeat every one of them. But Democrats will take the responsibility. Democrats in this House are not afraid to face the American people and tell them where we stand on all of these bills. We have come into power promising these things, and we are going to keep our pledges made to the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, this is an important occasion. To-day we are taking up for consideration the most significant political problems pending before this country. These three bills contain some things that will bring greater relief to the people of this country than any measure that has been considered since I have been a Member of this body. It means that hereafter we shall not negotiate with big business violating the law, but will set the limits on big business and tell them how far they shall go. We will pass statutes requiring them to salute the law. We are going forward. We are going to pass the bills, and they will pass the Senate before this summer has passed, and the President will put his approval on them. We will bring prosperity to this country. We shall do the things that ought to have been done 25 years ago, and would have been done if the old stand-pat Republican Party had not prevented it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, let me admonish my good friend from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] to come along with us and quit playing politics, and help us amend these bills and pass them and give them to the voters of this country.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK. Of course I will not say the gentleman is playing politics, but I want to ask him a question that is not political.

If the gentleman is not playing politics, why did not the gentleman from Texas, as chairman of the Committee on Rules, give the Progressives here a chance, with their constructive antitrust program, to amend this bill? Why did you cut us out?

Mr. HENRY. You have a chance to amend this bill everywhere.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman has described the state of the Republicans on this side, and he has properly described them. They want to keep the old Sherman antitrust law as it is without supplementary legislation, and some of the Republican members on the committee say so.

Mr. MANN. Let the gentleman speak for himself.

Mr. MURDOCK. We have a constructive program.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I can not yield further.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman has given this Republican crowd a chance to offer a motion to recommit and has shut us out.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. He has already yielded.

Mr. HENRY. I decline to yield further.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MURDOCK. He can not cut me out in the middle of a sentence after he has yielded.

Mr. HENRY. If the gentleman has diagnosed the old standpat Republican Party aright, then I say to him come with us and help us put these amendments on.

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman should sit down. He is taking too much time. I say, let him help us put these amendments on, and we will give the country relief.

And, in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. MADDEN. Why did you not write the bill on the square, so that it would not need any amendment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] moves the previous question. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays are demanded. Those in favor of taking this vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Forty-seven gentlemen have arisen in the affirmative. The noes will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Thirty-five gentlemen have arisen in the negative. Forty-seven are a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are ordered. The Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of ordering the previous question will answer "yea" when their names are called; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 192, nays 87, answered "present" 5, not voting 150, as follows:

Mr. HUGHES of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I should like to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening when his name should have been called?

Mr. HUGHES of Georgia. No, Mr. Speaker; I was not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] be substituted for that of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY], in pursuance of a tentative agreement arrived at a little while ago.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the name of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] be substituted for that of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY] to control time in opposition to the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] be recognized to make a request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] be recognized to make a request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, under a sense of duty I desire to make a brief statement to the House.

In a few days I shall return to the State of my nativity and there take up duties congenial to me, but in the administration of public justice rather than in the making of laws. I therefore deem it my duty at this time to express my appreciation of the confidence that the Committee on Rules and the House itself has shown in me by designating me to take charge of one of the bills mentioned in the resolution just adopted. But, Mr. Speaker, I can not be here longer, after having been appointed to another honorable position under this great Government that calls for duties in a different sphere. I must choose between these two duties; therefore I respectfully ask the House that my name be stricken from the resolution just adopted and that the name of the distinguished young statesman from North Carolina, Mr. WEBB, be substituted where mine now appears in the resolution.

Mr. Speaker, my heart is too full on this occasion to express the gratitude I feel for the uniform kindness extended to me by the House and the love I have for every Member. Everyone has shown me on all occasions the utmost courtesy and kindness.

If it be true as a philosophic fact that the power to make laws is the greatest of all governmental functions, then, perhaps, so far as the wishes of the people are concerned, this body, being nearer to them, is in some sort the greatest of all legislative bodies known to the civilized and progressive nations of the world.

Until very recently, as we all know, this body was the only agency under our plan of government chosen by direct vote of the people. Popular election of Representatives worked so well and so much have you as representatives of the American people merited commendation, that they have decided to choose Senators after the manner in which you have always been chosen. [Applause.] This is the highest indorsement that could possibly have been given to the House of Representatives.

Mr. Speaker, I have served with you here and with others for 17 years. That association has been most pleasant, and I can truly say that so far as my personal relations and my friendships are concerned I know no division by the center aisle of this House. [Applause.] I have had as much courtesy and kindness from that side of the Chamber as from this. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I beg to assure you and every Member of this House that I shall carry in my heart of hearts the highest appreciation and everlasting love for each and every Member and the most pleasant recollection of my associations here. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and you gentlemen of the House. [Long and loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the name of Mr. WEBB, of North Carolina, be substituted for his name in the control of time where it is mentioned in the resolution. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Under the resolution the House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. HULL, will take the chair.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HULL in the chair.

INTERSTATE TRADE COMMISSION.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 15613 and other bills. Under the rule, the first reading of H. R. 15613 is dispensed with, and the Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON] has acted as chairman of the subcommittee, and with great assiduity and ability has labored upon the preparation and perfection of the bill now before this committee. His work was so satisfactory that the subcommittee unanimously agreed, and when it was reported to the full committee was with almost perfect unanimity agreed to. Objection was made, as I remember, by only two persons, not that the bill was not good enough as far as it goes, but that it did not go further and do a little more.

The gentleman from Maryland, from his able and painstaking labors on the subject, probably understands the bill and the subject better than any other member of our committee, if not better than any member of the Committee of the Whole House, and it is with great pleasure, in consideration of his intimate acquaintance with the subject and in recognition of his fidelity and ability in the preparation of this bill, that I yield to him such part of the time allotted to me as he sees proper to use.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Chairman, the bill to create an interstate trade commission now presented to the House is the first legislative measure resulting from the message of the President read to Congress in January last on the subject of trusts and monopolies. In that message he recommended the creation of an interstate trade commission as an instrument of information and publicity and as a clearing house for the facts by which both the public mind and the managers of great business undertakings should be guided. Moreover, he suggested in that message that the commission ought to be made capable of assisting the courts in the shaping of corrective processes.

It is true that the President in urging the creation of a trade commission referred to the wishes of the business men as follows:

They desire the advice, the definite guidance, and information which can be supplied by an administrative body, an interstate trade commission.

And straightway certain big business men and their lawyers, who had in the field of industrial business constantly been hovering in the dim shadows of the twilight zone which separates honesty from unlawfulness, began to hail the message as the forerunner of a statute that would enable them to propose to a Government commission their plans for exploitation, conceived with subtlety and phrased in fair words, and obtain, perchance, that initial approval which would mean individual immunity at a later date if the subtlety of the plan had been followed by fraud or criminality in its consummation.

But these persons had not critically analyzed the President's message, for in speaking of the opinion of the country regarding the trade commission he had also said:

I would not wish to see it empowered to make terms with monopoly or in any sort to assume control of business, as if the Government made itself responsible.

The truth is that the administration idea and the idea of business men generally is for the preservation of proper competitive conditions in our great interstate commerce. That equal and complete freedom in business which is the way of peace and of success as well is best promoted by the unrestrained and uncontrolled genius and industry of the American business man. Consequently it would be completely out of harmony with our present idea to establish a commission clothed with the effective power to approve and disapprove proposed contracts, to enforce fair competition, to prohibit unfair competition, to have powers of regulation or control of prices, and the power directly to issue orders outlining the scope of the lawful operations of industrial business of this country.

In harmony with those general views the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce submits the bill now under consideration. In the concurring report of the Republican minority it has been accurately said:

For many years all legislation in this committee has been considered upon its merits, without regard to partisan lines or influences.

That has been emphatically the case with this bill to create an interstate trade commission. It is a piece of constructive legislation for the benefit of the whole country, and it was drafted by a subcommittee of Democrats and Republicans, who cooperated in the broadest spirit to produce a measure which will meet the public expectations and necessities. While the bill happens to bear my name, I want this House to understand that it is simply the result of the aggregate labors of the entire membership of a subcommittee, which in turn earnestly sought and gladly accepted all the expert advice it could obtain to produce a bill adequate to meet the sentiments and requirements of the whole people.

Mr. Chairman, public sentiment has undoubtedly crystallized for an interstate trade commission. Two of the three great political parties in the last presidential election advocated such a body in their national platforms. While the Democracy did not propose such a body or in any way deal with the subject as a campaign issue, the President, with that largeness of mind so characteristic of him, finding such a commission to be so desirable as an independent administrative body exercising certain powers in connection with our industrial business, has urged the legislation necessary for its creation. [Applause.]

Thoughtful men, without regard to party, have given definite expression to their views favoring an interstate trade commission. In a speech delivered on February 12, last, Victor Morawitz, one of the foremost corporation lawyers of the United States, said:

It is true, however, that more effective machinery could be provided for ascertaining violations of the law, for obtaining prompt decisions as to its application to specific cases as they arise, for enforcing the prohibitions of the law more promptly and more efficiently. To attain that result the creation of an interstate trade commission under an act carefully defining its functions, powers, and duties would be a wise and effective measure.

In the report of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, of which Senator CLAPP was chairman, made to the Senate on February 26, 1913, it was said:

If the Bureau of Corporations were converted into an independent commission composed of trained, skillful men, and clothed with adequate authority, there could be gathered more complete and accurate knowledge of the organization management, and practices of the corporations and associations engaged in national and international commerce than we now have. In saying this the committee does not mean to disparage the work of the Bureau of Corporations as hitherto carried on, but, valuable as the work has been, it is believed that a greater service could be rendered by a commission with a distinct organization with adequate appropriations and added authority. Moreover, it is clear that the constant inquiry into and investigation of interstate commerce in order to ascertain whether the law is being violated should be more closely connected with prosecutions for violations, when found to exist, than at the present time.

The report of the special committee on trust legislation of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America, made on April 14, 1914, contains a paragraph regarding the pending bill, as follows:

For the purposes which the trade-commission bill has in view—affecting business in its great branches of manufacture and merchandising—an independent commission is to be preferred to an official subordinate of a Cabinet officer. A commission will have in its membership one or more men whose experience and training have been gained primarily in business; thus there will always be possibility for representation of the point of view of practical men of affairs. It is inevitable that through the stimulus of discussion and exchange of suggestions among members a commission in its investigations and studies will more surely arrive at essential facts and will reach conclusions which are more truly decisive than is possible for the head of a departmental bureau. Although an individual may be more effective in performance of executive duties, a commission is more successful in dealing with questions involving consideration of complex elements. As the commission is to have a function of recommending legislation relative to trade practices and the like, it is all the more important that it should be a body of experts.

The bill, as it is now presented to this House for passage, has been subject to very wide publicity and very extensive analysis by business men and lawyers all over the country. It is not without its opponents. No piece of legislation intended to benefit the business men of the country and the great masses of the people alike can be expected to commend itself to those malefactors who seek special privilege through the shortcomings or the devious ways of the law. It is significant, however, that, amid all the generalizations of criticism which have taken place regarding this bill, the powers to be exercised by the commission created under it and the broader field of investigations to be entered by it have not been successfully attacked. So true a representative of that section of big business which is concerned with the sort of special privilege which revels in secrecy as the New York Journal of Commerce, in an editorial more than a column long on April 24, 1914, after discussing the bill to create the proposed interstate trade commission, and applauding the objections of Mr. Felix H. Levy, a well-known corporation lawyer, to the broad powers of publicity and investigation conferred upon the commission, gets its specific objection to the bill down to this paragraph:

But the Covington bill contains no provisions whatever giving to the proposed commission the right to pass upon questions of business procedure which business men may desire to propound. Mr. Levy is certainly not alone in his belief that so far from the proposed interstate trade commission meeting the demand which the President stated in January existed among the business community, it makes no attempt to meet that demand, but, on the contrary, sets up a tribunal whose only claim to recognition must consist in the possession of powers needlessly inquisitorial and perniciously broad.

I am glad to see the objections of a certain element in Wall Street so frankly stated. It is a singular thing that the men in control of that section of big business which needs stringent supervision and which has in the past been the subject of most criticism for its wayward practices are the men who so persistently urge that a trade commission ought by all means to be created; that the country is crying out for a trade commission, but that it must surely possess the plenary power to pass administrative orders of approval upon the various schemes of combination and business operation which their subtle minds or the cunning of their adroit lawyers can conceive to the disadvantage of the American people. It is just such a course as this that the President vigorously opposes and the committee deliberately determined to prevent. We do not believe that at this time it is possible for a trade commission always to judge accurately, and in the interest of honest big business and the public alike, respecting the approval or disapproval in advance of the plans of combinations to engage in interstate commerce. The approval of those plans may prevent the subsequent prosecution of individuals connected with them, no matter what flagrant violations of law may take place after such approval, and no matter how much ruthless robbery of the people through stock exploitations may have been the result.

It seems almost a foolish thing to present to this House the views of men concerned with industrial business that the creation of a trade commission as an independent body, and with the powers we have conferred upon it, is an eminently wise piece of legislation. That the present bill embodies a full measure of the broad powers which impartial and just business men would have the commission exercise is very evident. Many briefs have been filed by the counsel of these men, and from them I take a passage by Mr. Charles Wesley Dunn, of New York City, the very able counsel of the American Specialty Manufacturers' Association. He says:

The recital of the powers, authority, and duties of the proposed trade commission indicates that such a comuission would be in harmony with the suggestions of the President. It has been earnestly and sincerely urged, and with much force, that the commission should in the beginning be clothed with the effective power to deal directly with business, to approve and disapprove proposed contracts, cooperation, and other plans to enforce fair competition and prohibit unfair competition by administrative order. * * * The shadow of a commission thrust full-born and dominating, and suggesting control of private business, would worry the legitimate business world in a manner which would not be beneficial. It is indeed true that "such matters are of a most delicate, complex, and doubtful nature." A trade commission, which by experience has proven its worth and value and has gained the confidence of the business world, may extend its field of service more surely and safely. The President has indicated: "The object and spirit is to meet business halfway in its processes of self-correction and disturb its legitimate course as little as possible." The opinion is ventured that a careful, analytical, and impartial study of industrial business would be of incalculable value. It is believed that this need alone would warrant the creation of a trade commission.

The bill as reported provides for a commission of three members at a salary of $10,000 a year. The proposed commission will largely justify its creation by the method and manner of the performance of its varied duties by its members. The highly efficient services of men of large capacity will be required, and the salaries of the members of the commission have been placed at a figure which will enable the President to secure that sort of men. In the detailed organization of the commission the provisions of the existing act to regulate commerce and the amendments thereto creating the Interstate Commerce Commission are followed wherever practicable.

Under the act of February 14, 1903, the Bureau of Corporations was created as a bureau of the newly organized Department of Commerce and Labor. Under that act and its amendments, the Commissioner of Corporations was given rather extensive powers to investigate the organization and management of business corporations and to obtain such information as would enable the President to make recommendations to Congress for new legislation. With the creation of the Department of Labor in 1913, the bureau was one of those placed under the jurisdiction of the Department of Commerce. While the powers, authority, and duties conferred upon the Bureau of Corporations and the Commissioner of Corporations are broad, there was a failure specifically to require the regular gathering of certain most important kinds of information through the medium of annual reports from industrial corporations engaged in interstate commerce. The act also omitted to confer other powers, perhaps not then thought useful, but now believed to be most necessary to assist in effectuating the definite policy and functions for the proposed commission announced by the President in his trust message.

However, an interstate trade commission must almost of necessity be built up on the foundation existing through the Bureau of Corporations, and in section 3 the bill transfers to the commission all of the powers, authority, and duties of the Bureau of Corporations and of the Commissioner of Corporations. The broadest powers of that bureau and of the Commissioner of Corporations are embraced in the general provision of the law creating that bureau to investigate the organization, conduct, and management of the business of corporations, and to gather information and data to enable the President to make recommendations to Congress for legislation for the regulation of interstate commerce.

And, Mr. Chairman, I think it a just tribute to the broad vision and legal learning of the present minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], to remind Members of this House that he drafted the law creating that bureau amid the fulminations of great constitutional lawyers, who asserted that it attempted to break down the constitutional safeguards of business corporations. [Applause.]

The Commissioner of Corporations up to this time has not come to an issue in court with any corporation concerning the extent of the powers to be exercised under the very general phraseology of the law creating the Bureau of Corporations. At the same time, in the case of United States v. Armour & Co. (142 Fed. Rep., 808), before Judge Humphrey in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, the validity of those powers was expressly in issue in a criminal case. It was held that—> the primary purpose of the act was legislative, to enable Congress by information secured through the work of officers charged with the execution of that law to pass such remedial legislation as might be found necessary, and the act must be construed in view of that purpose—and that its provisions were definite expressions of legislative intent and constitutionally enforceable.

Notwithstanding the ordinary objections to legislation by mere reference to existing statutes, the committee felt that in view of the judicial determination of the validity of the powers of the Bureau of Corporations and of the Commissioner of Corporations and their broad character it is by far the wisest course in the pending bill to transfer those powers to the commission by specific reference to the existing law.

But, Mr. Chairman, the great value to the American people of the Interstate Commerce Commission has been largely because of its independent power and authority. The dignity of the proposed commission and the respect in which its performance of its duties will be held by the people will also be largely because of its independent power and authority. Therefore the bill removes entirely from the control of the President and the Secretary of Commerce the investigations conducted and the information acquired by the commission under the authority heretofore exercised by the Bureau of Corporations or the Commissioner of Corporations. All such investigations may hereafter be made upon the initiative of the commission, and the information obtained may be made public entirely at the discretion of the commission.

One of the foremost opponents of the creation of the Bureau of Corporations was Mr. Carman F. Randolph, a prominent New York lawyer. He has prepared a brief against the pending bill to create a trade commission "at the request of certain corporate interests within the purview of the bill."

In opposing the powers provided in the bill for the commission, he says:

> While the nature and purposes of the commission and the strong phrasing of its powers suggest a sharper inquisitorial activity than the bureau * * * the main constitutional issue is not more deeply involved in the commission bill than in the bureau act.

Having regard for the admitted constitutionality of the bureau act to the extent necessary for the decision in United States against Armour & Co., supra, and considering the nature, according to Mr. Randolph, of the additional powers of great value to the people and industrial business itself to be exercised by the commission, this House may feel well assured that constitutional limitations are duly regarded at the same time that the commission is required to perform effective duties not now existing with the Bureau of Corporations.

Now let us take up the powers conferred upon the interstate trade commission in the pending bill, and which are beyond the purview of the Bureau of Corporations. There has been serious question whether under the powers of the Bureau of Corporations there may be required annual or special reports of specified corporations, indicating information as to the financial condition, organization, bondholders, stockholders, relation to other corporations, and business practices while engaged in interstate commerce. None were apparently contemplated in the law creating that bureau, and certainly there was no compulsory power provided to obtain them.

Therefore, in section 9 of the bill, annual reports from the great industrial concerns of the country are provided for, setting forth essential facts connected with the organization, stockholders, financial condition, and general business conduct of those concerns.

The testimony before the committee by many men of large business experience was singularly in accord with the idea that these reports will afford one of the surest means of that publicity which will tend to an elevated business standard and a better business stability. All corporations engaged in interstate commerce having a capital of more than $5,000,000 are required to file these reports. But it is not always the large corporation that has an organization or financial condition or a system of practices that requires publicity to bring about lawful methods in its business. It is quite possible that a group of small corporations may be so operated as to cause serious violations of law. The commission is given the power, therefore, to make classifications of corporations having a capital of less than $5,000,000, which shall be required to make the same annual reports that are to be made by the large corporations. This power of classification will relieve the mass of smaller business concerns engaged in interstate commerce from the necessity of making such reports, while it reserves to the commission that discretion which it ought to have to provide for rational publicity of bad practices in interstate commerce without regard to the size of the corporations engaging in those practices.

The commission, under this section, may also require such special reports as it may deem advisable. By this means, if the ordinary data furnished by a corporation in its annual reports do not adequately disclose its organization, financial condition, business practices, or relation to other corporations, there can be obtained by a special report such additional information as the commission may deem necessary.

Compulsory publicity of an abstract of the annual and special report of each corporation is required by the provision of section 17 that such abstract must be included in the published annual report of the commission. The section contains, however, ample safeguards to prevent the disclosure of those necessary trade secrets which are of no value to the public in promoting lawful competitive business, but which when disclosed simply afford an opportunity for injurious use by competitors.

In some quarters these annual and special reports seem to be regarded as an unnecessary publicity of the affairs of corporations. It is therefore well to note that both the preliminary and final reports of the industrial commission recommended as the chief measures of reform to check the growth of monopoly, greater publicity regarding the operations of corporations, and particularly the establishment of some organ of publicity in the Federal Government.

The preliminary report of the industrial commission submitted to Congress in 1900 said in part as follows:

> The larger corporations—the so-called trusts—should be required to publish annually a properly audited report showing in reasonable detail their assets and liabilities, with profit and loss; such reports and audit under oath to be subject to Government inspection. The purpose of such publicity is to encourage competition when profits become excessive, thus protecting consumers against too high prices and to guard the interests of employees by a knowledge of the financial condition of the business in which they are employed.

The final report of the industrial commission, submitted to Congress in 1902, in volume 19, pages 650–651, said in part as follows:

> That there be created in the Treasury Department a permanent bureau the duties of which shall be to register all State corporations engaged in interstate or foreign commerce; to secure from such corporations all reports needed to enable the Government to levy a franchise tax with certainty and justice, and to collect the same; to make such inspection and examination of the business and accounts of such corporations as will guarantee the completeness and accuracy of the information needed to ascertain whether such corporations are observing the conditions prescribed in the act and to enforce penalties against delinquents; and to collate and publish information regarding such combinations and the industries in which they may be engaged, so as to furnish to the Congress proper information for possible future legislation.

The publicity secured by the governmental agency should be such as will prevent the deception of the public through secrecy in the organization and management of industrial combinations or through false information. Such agency would also have at its command the best sources of information regarding special privileges or discriminations, of whatever nature, by which industrial combinations secure monopoly or become dangerous to the public welfare. It is probable that the provisions herein recommended will be sufficient to remove most of the abuses which have arisen in connection with industrial combinations. The remedies suggested may be employed with little or no danger to industrial prosperity and with the certainty of securing information which should enable the Congress to protect the public by further legislation if necessary.

Well-known publicists also place first in the order of correctives for the evils to competition and fair trade still existing in the world of interstate commerce a wide publicity of corporation affairs. In his book, "Trusts or Industrial Combinations in the United States" (1899), Prof. Von Halle, in his chapter, "Conclusions," pages 145–146, says:

In a form which corresponds to the character of the people and Constitution, the railroad problem has been intrusted to a controlling commission; a similar measure is asked for to-day, in view of the great capitalistic organization of production. The means by which it is attempted to settle the great social problems are in many respects identical all over the world. It is not a mechanical regulation of business life, which would lame the individual and make him subservient to a vast machine that is sought for, but a display of the rights of the Nation by means of a control in the hands of the community and in the full light of publicity. No author has conceived better the meaning of the corporation problem for the Commonwealth than Henry C. Adams. He asks for publicity, publication of the results, and the ways in which they were reached; a control through public bodies and a responsibility of the individual member of the administration of the corporation for the observance of the necessary restrictions. The leaders of the large companies have power and honor, but are not kept face to face with sufficient supervision.

In his recent work, "Corporations and the State" (1911), THEODORE E. BURTON, United States Senator from Ohio, says, regarding publicity as a vital force in the regulation of industrial business (pp. 60–61):

The manifest tendency, however, is toward greater publicity; and it should be borne in mind that if a corporation is receiving abnormal profits it is but fair to the public that this should be known. If profits are due to unusual ability, to care, and skill, that is one thing; if they are due to the possession of monopoly privileges or to oppression and exaction, that is another. In any event it would seem that the public is entitled to know whether corporations are being conducted in accordance with the requirements of law. This is certainly true in the case of the great corporations carrying on business on a large scale and coming in close touch with the needs of the people in the production of the necessaries of life. When the régime of publicity was introduced in Germany in 1884 fear was expressed that the business of corporations would be destroyed and their stockholders ruined if the details of their earnings and general condition were made public. But time has proven that these grave apprehensions were groundless.

And further on he says (pp. 137–138):

Of all regulations which promise results, publicity should be placed first. The most common argument against greater publicity is that the public has no more right to know about a corporation's affairs than about the affairs of a private individual. Such a view shows a radical misconception of the nature of a corporation. A business organization which is incorporated is a public agency invested with public responsibility. The basis for its existence is not merely the opportunity afforded its members to make profits, but its ability to perform a service more efficiently than any individual. At first, it may not seem desirable to impose this rule upon all the smaller corporations, but when they assume any considerable size there is no other adequate way to protect investors, creditors, and others who are affected.

In a recent address Mr. Guy E. Tripp, chairman of the board of directors, Westinghouse Electric Co., referring to the pending interstate trade commission bill, said:

A trade commission seems to me to be needed in a well-rounded plan of business legislation. No other agency can so well collect information, conduct investigations, and determine facts for the guidance of the legislature and courts, and that in the last analysis is all the power that the bill gives it. No great harm can come from elaborate powers given the commission in way of getting papers and documents except expense and bother to the corporations.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COVINGTON. Certainly.

Mr. BATHRICK. Right on that point, in section 9, I notice that in the discretion of the commission this publicity will take place.

Mr. COVINGTON. That is correct.

Mr. BATHRICK. It just occurred to me that the public was not certain to get this information if it relied wholly on the discretion of the commission.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that that is the same discretion the Interstate Commerce Commission now possesses, and there has never been any trouble in the 27 years' history of that commission about the public getting all of the information about the railroads that was desired. Moreover, there will inevitably be in the great mass of data collected from 1,300 corporations in the United States certain classes of information which would serve the public no useful purpose, would merely encumber the reports of the commission, and give the American people no information which would enable them to judge of the practices of the corporations, whether they were proper or improper. I think we may safely trust at all times to the personnel of an independent commission, whose members may be named by Presidents of the United States of any political faith, to deal squarely in matters of publicity between the American people and big corporate business in interstate commerce. [Applause.]

Regarding one clause of section 9 there has arisen some legal controversy. Many small corporations have claimed to believe that they may be improperly affected by the expression which authorizes the commission to classify for reports corporations having less capital than $5,000,000. It has been urged by some that this supposed delegation by Congress to an administrative body of its legislative powers is of doubtful constitutionality. An early and leading case upon the subject is Field v. Clark (143 U. S., 649). There the President was authorized to suspend "for such time as he shall deem just" the tariff provisions relating to the free introduction of certain articles whenever satisfied that any country producing such articles imposed duties upon the products of this country "which he shall deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable." The court held that this provision was constitutional and did not "in any real sense invest the President with the power of legislation" (p. 692).

In Butterfield v. Stranahan (192 U. S., 470), the court sustained the constitutionality of the tea-inspection act of March 2, 1897 (29 Stat., 604). That act gave the Secretary of the Treasury power, with the aid of a tea-inspection board, to "fix and establish uniform standards of purity, quality, and fitness for consumption of all kinds of tea imported into the United States"; and prohibited the importation of tea "of inferior purity, quality, and fitness for consumption to such standards." The court rejected the contention that this was a delegation of legislative power, saying:

We are of opinion that the statute, when properly construed, * * * but expresses the purpose to exclude the lowest grades of tea, whether demonstrably of inferior purity, or unfit for consumption, or presumably so because of their inferior quality. This, in effect, was the fixing of a primary standard and devolved upon the Secretary of the Treasury the mere executive duty to effectuate the legislative policy declared in the statute. * * * Congress legislated on the subject as far as was reasonably practicable, and from the necessities of the case was compelled to leave to executive officials the duty of bringing about the result pointed out by the statute. To deny the power of Congress to delegate such a duty would, in effect, amount but to declaring that the plenary power vested in Congress to regulate foreign commerce could not be efficaciously exerted (p. 496).

In In re Kollock (165 U. S., 526) the law taxing oleomargarine required it to be packed in wooden boxes, "marked, stamped, and branded as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe." A violation of this provision was made punishable by fine and imprisonment. It was held that this was not an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power.

In Union Bridge Co. v. United States (204 U. S., 364) a statute delegating to the Secretary of War the power to determine conclusively that any bridge over a navigable waterway is an unreasonable obstruction to navigation and to require its removal, and imposing a fine of $5,000 upon proof of the owners' disobedience of the order for its removal, was held proper. The court said:

By the statute in question Congress declared in effect that navigation should be free from unreasonable obstructions arising from bridges of insufficient height, width of span, or other defects. It stopped, however, with this declaration of a general rule and imposed upon the Secretary of War the duty of ascertaining what particular cases came within the rule prescribed by Congress, as well as the duty of enforcing the rule in such cases. In performing that duty the Secretary of War will only execute the clearly expressed will of Congress, and will not, in any true sense, exert legislative or judicial power (p. 386).

In St. Louis & Iron Mountain Railway Co. v. Taylor (210 U. S., 281, 287) the court sustained section 5 of the safety-appliance act (27 Stat., 531), which provided, in effect, that after a date named only cars with drawbars of uniform height should be used in interstate commerce, and that the standard should be fixed by the American Railway Association and declared by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

In United States v. Grimaud (220 U. S., 506) the act establishing forest reserves (26 Stat., 1103), as amended by Thirtieth Statute, page 35, and Thirty-third Statute, page 628, authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to—make provisions for the protection against destruction by fire and depredations upon the public forests and forest reservations * * * and to make such rules and regulations and establish such services as will insure the objects of such reservation, namely, to regulate their occupancy and use and to preserve the forests thereon from destruction—and imposed a punishment for the violation of such regulations. Under this authority the Secretary made a regulation forbidding the grazing of sheep on such reservations without his permission. The defendants were indicted for violating this regulation. Held, the delegation of power was constitutional and the regulation was proper. The court said (p. 516):

In authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to meet these local conditions Congress was merely conferring administrative functions upon an agent and not delegating to him legislative power.

In United States v. Antikamnia Chemical Co. (231 U. S., 654) it was held that section 3 of the pure food and drugs act (34 Stat., 768), giving the Secretaries of the Treasury, of Agriculture, and of Commerce and Labor the power "to make uniform rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of the act," authorized them to make a regulation requiring the labels on packages of drugs containing any derivative of the substances named in section 8 of the act to state the name of the parent substance as well as of the derivative. It was held that while the power given to the Secretaries was "undoubtedly one of regulation—an administrative power only—not a power to alter or add to the act," the regulation in question was "administrative of the law" and not "additive to it. * * * If it fulfills the purpose of the law it can not be said to be an addition to the law * * *" (pp. 666-667).

In Interstate Commerce Commission v. Union Pacific Railroad Co. (224 U. S., 194) the court held that section 20 of the commerce act gave the commission power to require reports both of the interstate and intrastate business of carriers subject to the act and held that section 20 thus construed was not an unlawful delegation of legislative power to the commission. It was said:

The Congress may not delegate its purely legislative power to a commission, but, having laid down the general rules of action under which a commission shall proceed, it may require of that commission the application of such rules to particular situations and the investigation of facts, with a view to making orders in a particular matter within the rules laid down by the Congress. * * *

In section 20 Congress has authorized the commission to require annual reports. The act itself prescribes in detail what these reports shall contain. The commission is permitted, in its discretion, to require a uniform system of accounting and to prohibit other methods of accounting than those which the commission may prescribe. In other words, Congress has laid down general rules for the guidance of the commission, leaving to it merely the carrying out of details in the exercise of the power so conferred. This, we think, is not a delegation of legislative authority (pp. 214, 215).

From the above cases it seems conclusive that when Congress has once fixed the general test or principle to be applied it may confer on administrative officers a wide latitude of discretion in applying that test or principle. Judged by this rule, the provision in question is clearly constitutional. It obviously is not intended to confer an utterly arbitrary and unlimited discretion upon the commission. The implied test of the propriety of requiring a certain class of corporations to furnish reports is plainly the due enforcement of the antitrust acts and the performance of the commission's duties in assisting to enforce those acts. A primary test may be implied as well as expressed. (Butterfield v. Stranahan, supra.) The test here implied—the due enforcement of the antitrust acts—is sufficiently specific.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COVINGTON. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE. Is the gentleman referring in his second classification to the line on page 8 of the bill which refers to "a class of corporations which the commission will designate"?

Mr. COVINGTON. I am.

Mr. MOORE. That is the second class which the gentleman is now explaining?

Mr. COVINGTON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. May I ask if this bill does not apply wholly to corporations other than common-carrier corporations which are now subject to the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. COVINGTON. Unquestionably, except in a single section. If the gentleman will read the bill carefully, he will find a definition of the word "commerce" which we have created in order to simplify the bill. When that word is used throughout the act it necessarily limits the operations of the commission to interstate commerce, and the bill expressly excludes railways by excepting corporations subject to the act to regulate commerce, except in the section which provides for an investigation to be made to find the facts relating to violations of the antitrust law. We did not think we could circumscribe the right of such investigation by stating it should only take place with respect to corporations not subject to that act, because a railroad corporation, subject to the act to regulate commerce and controlled exclusively under that act, in so far as the regulation of its rates and its practices and all that sort of thing is concerned, may be engaged in a combination in violation of the Sherman law in connection with a group of hotel companies, for example. The investigation of the hotel companies for operating as a monopoly would force the interstate trade commission into an investigation of the railway itself. But aside from that section, I will say to the gentleman that in every part of this bill railways are carefully excluded. The committee felt that the Interstate Commerce Commission was so wisely, so well, and so satisfactorily, to the great body of American people, performing its duties as a regulatory body over the railroads of this country that we did not want to enter the domain of their power.

Mr. MOORE. In the course of the gentleman's forceful speech he has referred several times to big business and little business. That means business of a corporation, whether big or little?

Mr. COVINGTON. Unquestionably. And in that connection I want to say that I do not regard business as dangerous merely because it is big. The phrase was merely a term commonly used to apply to those great corporations in the interstate commerce of the country.

Mr. MOORE. It does not refer to a business man who is not incorporated, or to business men who are not incorporated?

Mr. COVINGTON. It does not. The business which ought properly to be affected by the operation of a trade commission is so nearly always operated by corporations that the committee did not think it wise to make the provisions of the bill apply to individuals.

Mr. MOORE. Just one more question. On page 5 the word "corporation" is defined to mean—a body incorporated under law, and also joint-stock associations and all other associations having shares of capital or capital stock or organized to carry on business with a view to profit.

During a previous discussion in the House a question arose as to whether we should include in certain legislation a corporation publishing a socialistic newspaper, which had seven or eight thousand stockholders—in effect a paper published by a labor association. Would that be included amongst those corporations having—shares of capital or capital stock or organized to carry on business with a view to profit?

Would that be included amongst those subject to inquiry by and report to an interstate trade commission?

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I would not like to hazard an opinion upon whether a particular journal would or would not be included, because that might involve some sort of examination as to the precise method and manner of the business organization conducting the journal. I will say this, that I think I know what the gentleman is driving at. There was not any intention in the framing of that definition in this bill to create any exemptions for labor organizations or farmers' organizations, or any other sort of organizations that exist in the United States of America, because the proposed trade commission will not deal with any of them in such a way as to infringe their just rights.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COVINGTON. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. I might suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] that those corporations included in this act must not only be corporations within the definition of corporations, but they must be engaged in commerce within the definition of commerce, and that means such commerce as Congress has the power to regulate under the Constitution.

Mr. MOORE. But if the gentleman will look at page 5 he will find it refers to any association having shares of capital or capital stock, or organized to carry on business with a view to profit, which was certainly the case with regard to that socialistic newspaper, which has seven or eight thousand stockholders, which was especially exempted from certain operations of the postal laws.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; and if the gentleman will turn to page 7, section 9, he will see reference there to "every corporation engaged in commerce," so that the definition he must refer to is not only the definition of "corporations," but also the definition of "commerce," because it must be a corporation within the definition, and also be engaged in commerce within the definition.

Mr. TOWNER. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the distinction of "commerce." As I understand it, he said it was written in the bill, so as to exclude railroad companies. The distinction is given in section 6, as follows:

Commerce means such commerce as Congress has power to regulate under the Constitution.

Mr. COVINGTON. I fear the gentleman misunderstood me. What I meant to say was this, that the definitions and express exemptions eliminate carriers from the operation of this act, except in a single section. That is the meaning I intended to convey.

Mr. TOWNER. The definition of commerce as here given——

Mr. COVINGTON. The definition of "commerce" is broad enough to cover any commerce over which the Federal courts have control.

Mr. TOWNER. I have not examined the bill carefully enough to know whether its exclusion would be carried out in other places of the bill or not.

Mr. COVINGTON. I think the gentleman, whose legal ability I always gladly recognize, will find on a careful examination of this bill that we have excluded railways from every provision of it except the single one to which I have referred.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to return from the diversion, I want to say a final word regarding the classification of the corporations under section 9. The Congress has itself fixed two broad classes, those with more than $5,000,000 capital, which are arbitrarily required to file reports, and those with less than $5,000,000, which, under rules and regulations of the commission, may or may not report. In the language of the Supreme Court in the Antikamnia case, the regulation classifying certain corporations from which reports must be filed is "administrative of the law" and not "additive to it."

I come now to another important power of the commission. The commission will also be required under section 10 of the bill, by the direction of the President, the Attorney General, or either House of Congress, to investigate and report the facts relative to any alleged violation of the antitrust acts, and it may include in its report recommendations for readjustment of business so that the corporations investigated may operate lawfully.

It has long been the opinion of lawyers who have represented the Government that there should be some compulsory process whereby the Department of Justice, before bringing suit under the antitrust act, can obtain all the information necessary to determine whether the act has been violated and for the proper statement of the case if there has been a violation. As the law now stands in civil proceedings under the antitrust laws the department has no means of compelling the disclosure of facts in advance of bringing suit. This deficiency is fully met by the provision of section 10 of the pending bill.

Especially valuable will be the provision that agents of the commission shall have the right to examine the files of any corporation under investigation. This is a much more effective means of obtaining information than by a subpœna duces tecum, since before making use of the latter the prosecutor must know what records and documents to specify, whereas there may be in the possession of the corporation many records and documents material to the inquiry of which he has no knowledge and which could only be discovered by such an examination as this section authorizes.

Attorney General Harmon, in reply to a House resolution of January 7, 1896, requesting a report regarding the enforcement of the laws against trusts and conspiracies in restraint of trade, and what further legislation, if any, was needed, in part said:

> If the Department of Justice is expected to conduct investigations of alleged violations of the present law or of the law as it may be amended, it must be provided with a liberal appropriation and a force properly selected and organized. * * * But I respectfully submit that the general policy which has hitherto been pursued of confining this department very closely to court work is a wise one, and that the duty of detecting offenses and furnishing evidence thereof should be committed to some other department or bureau.

Moreover, the Department of Justice has often found that an agreement for readjustment by an offending corporation accomplishes a better result than the continuance of a prosecution. Heretofore there has been no administrative body to obtain the information that will assist in attaining such an end, and in connection with this power now conferred the commission has a most desirable independence preserved by giving it the entire control of its report to be made after such investigation. There can thus be no laxity at the Department of Justice when it is presented with the facts disclosing violations of law.

Mr. MADDEN. The creation of this commission would not create ability in men, would it?

Mr. COVINGTON. Certainly not.

Mr. MADDEN. They would not be able to get any better experts under the commission plan than under the other?

Mr. COVINGTON. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized as a pretty good business man, and he knows that when you begin to organize a bureau as an independent administrative body, authorize it to do work along certain lines, and employ steadily special classes of legal experts and certain classes of experts in the various lines of industrial business to make investigations, that just as the Interstate Commerce Commission has created its trained experts to get the facts regarding railway operations in the country, you would develop a set of experts by the constant special work who will be much more successful than the chance investigators that the Department of Justice or the Bureau of Corporations is able to find.

Mr. MADDEN. I am willing to admit you can train men to become specialists.

Mr. COVINGTON. That is all I intended to mean by the assertion I made.

Broad as are the powers of the Bureau of Corporations, the Commissioner of Corporations, in his report of 1904 (p. 14) defines the limit of those powers. He says:

> He can not make investigations or procure or furnish information by means of his compulsory powers for the purpose of enforcing penal provisions other than those contained in the organic act of the bureau.

It is therefore certain that the power to investigate and report the facts concerning alleged violations of the antitrust acts, including the power to make recommendations for readjustment of business in accordance with law, is not now vested in the Bureau of Corporations.

And, Mr. Speaker, herein is to be found the full measure of "definite guidance and counsel," and the spirit "to meet business halfway in its process of self-correction" which the President referred to in his special message to Congress. Not to advise in advance, in a fashion at variance with our entire jurisprudence, but to meet in a spirit of compromise and conciliation those who really have unwittingly offended and who desire to obey the law.

That this investigational power is a constitutional delegation of power seems certain. By section 3 of Article II of the Constitution it is specifically required of the President that "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." The Attorney General is merely an arm of the Executive, and it was no doubt in consonance with this constitutional provision that Attorney General Harmon wrote the report to Congress above referred to. It is thus certain that the investigations by the commission under this section, by direction of either the President or the Attorney General, will be in the exercise of valid power delegated to the commission.

In so far as the investigations under this section as the result of resolutions of Congress, or either House thereof, are concerned, the commission is authorized to perform a legal and certainly a most beneficent function. Congress, having the constitutional authority to legislate in regard to interstate and foreign commerce, has the power to obtain all the information necessary to make such legislation appropriate and adequate. Its future regulation of industrial corporations engaged in interstate and foreign commerce may be as much determined by information concerning the present practices of corporations in violation of law as otherwise. In its judgment the existing substantive law or procedure of the courts may be ineffective and new remedial legislation may be the solution. In repeated cases the Supreme Court has held that "Congress may not delegate its purely legislative power to a commission," but it has not been held that Congress may not by a commission elicit information in order to lay the foundation for intelligent and effective action in the matter of regulating interstate and foreign commerce.

Unthinking criticism has been directed against such power to be conferred on the commission. However, more than 25 years ago Judge Cooley, the distinguished chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, said of such power then believed to exist in that commission:

> This is a very important provision, and the commission will no doubt have frequent occasion to take action under it. It will not hesitate to do so in any case in which a mischief of public importance is thought to exist and which is not likely to be brought to its attention on complaint by a private prosecutor.

The committee also limited the authority of the commission under this section to investigating and reporting the facts and did not authorize it to make findings as to whether the antitrust laws had been violated. A grave constitutional question might arise from any attempt to confer this larger authority upon the commission, but putting the constitutional question aside, the practical results may be most unfortunate. If the commission, acting under such a provision, ascertained the facts in respect of an alleged violation of the antitrust act and reported them to the Attorney General, together with its conclusion that the facts disclosed a violation of the act, and the Attorney General was nevertheless of opinion that the facts found by the commission did not constitute a violation of the act, he must nevertheless prosecute. For if, in his discretion, he refused to prosecute, that course would soon bring a collision between the commission and the Department of Justice.

In addition to the broad powers of subpœna conferred on the commission and available for investigations under the section, it is also expressly provided that—

For the purpose of prosecuting any investigation or proceeding authorized by this section, the commission, or its duly authorized agent or agents, shall at all reasonable times have access to, for the purpose of examination, and the right to copy any documentary evidence of any corporation being investigated or proceeded against.

Those who oppose this bill as containing unusual inquisitorial power point to this paragraph as constituting a clear invasion of the constitutional guaranty against unreasonable searches and seizures contained in the fourth amendment to the Constitution.

In section 20 of the amended act to regulate commerce is contained an almost identical provision. It has been much availed of by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and has only been brought into question in a case or two where the commission sought access to documents which the carrier believed was not included in the language of the act. That it is entirely unconstitutional has never been contended.

The search-and-seizure clause of the fourth amendment undoubtedly applies to corporations. (Hale v. Henkel, 201 U. S., 43, 76.) It seems, however, that its application to corporations is much narrower than its application to individuals; for corporations, unlike individuals, are not protected by the self-incrimination provision of the fifth amendment. (Hale v. Henkel, supra.) And one purpose of the fourth amendment is substantially the same as that of the self-incrimination provision of the fifth—to prevent the forcible production of an individual's private books and papers to be used in evidence against him. (Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S., 616, 633.) It seems to follow that a search or seizure directed against a corporation can not be "unreasonable" simply because it compels the production of testimony against that corporation, and it has been so intimated by the Supreme Court. (Interstate Commerce Commission v. Baird, 194 U. S., 25, 45–46; Hale v. Henkel, supra, 73–75.) The unreasonableness of a search or seizure directed against a corporation must therefore rest on another basis than that of self-incrimination. That basis is indicated in Hale v. Henkel, supra, as follows:

We are also of opinion that an order for the production of books and papers may constitute an unreasonable search and seizure within the fourth amendment. While a search ordinarily implies a quest by an officer of the law, and a seizure contemplates a forcible dispossession of the owner, still, as was held in the Boyd case, the substance of the offense is the compulsory production of private papers, whether under a search warrant or a subpœna duces tecum, against which the person, be he individual or corporation, is entitled to protection. Applying the test of reasonableness to the present case, we think the subpœna duces tecum is far too sweeping in its terms to be regarded as reasonable. It does not require the production of a single contract, or of contracts with a particular corporation, or a limited number of documents, but all understandings, contracts, or correspondence between the MacAndrews & Forbes Co., and no less than six different companies, as well as all reports made and accounts rendered by such companies from the date of the organization of the MacAndrews & Forbes Co., as well as all letters received by that company since its organization from more than a dozen different companies, situated in seven different States in the Union.

If the writ had required the production of all the books, papers, and documents found in the office of the MacAndrews & Forbes Co., it would scarcely be more universal in its operation, or more completely put a stop to the business of that company. Indeed, it is difficult to say how its business could be carried on after it had been denuded of this mass of material, which is not shown to be necessary in the prosecution of this case, and is clearly in violation of the general principle of law with regard to the particularity required in the description of documents necessary to a search warrant or subpœna. * * * A general subpœna of this description is equally indefensible as a search warrant would be if couched in similar terms (pp. 76–77).

This language applies in terms only to search warrants and subpœnas duces tecum. The principle there laid down would scarcely be extended to an examination of books and papers by an administrative officer under statutory authority. Indeed, it seems to have been expressly left open by the opinion in Hale v. Henkel, which concludes:

Of course, in view of the power of Congress over interstate commerce to which we have adverted, we do not wish to be understood as holding that an examination of the books of a corporation, if duly authorized by act of Congress, would constitute an unreasonable search and seizure within the fourth amendment (p. 77).

This language can not mean that Congress may authorize a violation of the fourth amendment, and its only other meaning is that the court was prepared to draw a distinction between such an administrative power of visitation as is conferred by the section of the present bill and the judicial process of search warrant or subpœna duces tecum involved in Hale v. Henkel.

The test to be applied where corporations are concerned is that of reasonableness in fact, as Hale v. Henkel, supra, plainly indicates. The court has frequently recognized the wide visitorial powers which Congress may exercise over corporations engaged in interstate commerce, and the necessity for a considerable latitude in the exercise of this power. (I. C. C. v. Baird, supra; I. C. C. v. Brimson, 154 U. S., 447; I. C. C. v. Goodrich Transit Co, supra, 215; Kansas City Southern Railway Co v. United States, 231 U. S., 423.) And observing the broad application of the rule in the "Beef Trust cases," United States v. Armour & Co. (142 Fed. Rep., 808), there would seem to be no doubt that there is ample authority for the full exercise in a constitutional manner of the inquisitorial and visitorial powers conferred upon the commission.

In section 12 there is conferred upon the commission a broad and useful power as adjunct to the courts in suits arising under the antitrust laws. This is another essential power not vested in the Bureau of Corporations. There has been no proper bureau equipped with a trained force to assist the Department of Justice and the courts in solving the difficult economic problems connected with the dissolution of corporations which have been adjudged to be operating in violation of the antitrust laws, and one of the most effective powers conferred upon the interstate trade commission is that contained in the section authorizing the courts to refer to it the matters of the pending suit at the conclusion of the testimony therein to ascertain and report an appropriate form of decree. The purpose of such investigation is to give the court the most complete economic information to assist it. This power, of course, does not authorize the commission to gather evidence to be offered in any case considered by the court as the basis of its judgment, and it amply safeguards the constitutional rights of defendants by reserving to them the same right to file exception to the report that now exists in relation to masters' reports in equity causes in the Federal courts. The commission, as an independent body of specialists, will, however, have placed upon it the proper burden of framing the plans for the effective segregation and readjustment of unlawful combination, subject, of course, to the approval of the court.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COVINGTON. I will.

Mr. FOWLER. The provision in section 12 is a departure, is it not, from the ordinary rule of courts?

Mr. COVINGTON. Oh, absolutely. It creates a certain innovation in the judicial procedure of this country; but it is an innovation that has the approval of about as heterogeneous a group of well-informed gentlemen as in this country could possibly be found. I find a statement of approval in The Outlook, which is supposed to be the embodiment of Mr. Roosevelt's Progressive Party views. I find also Mr. Samuel Untermyer, who is supposed to be somewhat of an authority on this sort of legislation, in a recent magazine article advocating it. And several of the most conservative of business men, such as Seth Low, think it a proper function of the commission.

Mr. FOWLER. I did not rise for the purpose of offering a criticism, but I want to ask the gentleman if he had any fears that it might delay a final judgment in case the court——

Mr. COVINGTON. On the contrary—and I will try to tell the gentleman from Illinois the history of the dissolution of the American Tobacco Co. When the Supreme Court decided that the Tobacco Trust was a combination in restraint of trade, no effective decree of dissolution was formulated, but the case was remanded to Judge Lacombe of the Southern District Court of New York, with instructions to formulate a decree of dissolution in consonance with the opinion. When the case got back to Judge Lacombe he found this proposition confronting him: Here was a great combination, with its trade ramifications everywhere, with 35 or 40 constituent companies doing all branches of tobacco business. He was a lawyer and not an economist. His training had been along the lines of legal study and not of industrial operations and statistics. Here, however, he was confronted with the proposition to formulate a decree that would at once create an effective dissolution of the trust and also safeguard the honest interests of the thousands of stockholders of the many constituent companies who were about to be launched into independent business. What actually happened was that the Attorney General and the representatives of the tobacco company, week after week and month after month, labored over a decree by consent. They called on the Bureau of Corporations for such information as it had regarding the American Tobacco Co., and they finally evolved by agreement a sort of decree that they thought would fit the case and submitted it to Judge Lacombe for his final approval. The net result was that, by reason of the lack of an efficient body charged with the handling of the numerous facts relating to all those tobacco concerns and assisting the court, a delay was caused and an imperfect decree resulted. If Judge Lacombe had been able to refer to a commission of the sort now proposed the whole record in the case and obtain a report concerning the form of a proper constructive decree of dissolution, the public would have been more speedily and more effectively served.

I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

Mr. FOWLER. Does not the gentleman think that when a case is being tried the court should say, in the first instance, that it needed help, and make a demand or a request upon the commission for such information as it might have at its command concerning the truth or concerning the business that was affected by the suit, rather than wait until after the evidence is all in and then submit the case to the Interstate Commerce Commission for an opinion as to what character of a judgment should be rendered?

Mr. COVINGTON. I think that would be an invasion of the constitutional right of the defendant.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. COVINGTON. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I wanted to say to the gentleman that, as I understood it, in cases of this character this report of the commission upon the request of the court was to be treated as the report of a master in chancery. If that is the case, I commend the gentleman and the committee, because it seems to me that that is not only a very ingenious and very expeditious method of treatment, but it is entirely within the powers of every court in every instance where a court desires to have before it in a case of equity a report from a master in chancery. It has a very large discretionary power. It is not bound to accept the report of the master in chancery, neither would the court here be bound to accept the report of the commission. But it might act upon it and use it, and it seems to me that that is not only perfectly legal, but a very expeditious and well-informed method of getting the information before the court.

Mr. COVINGTON. The last three or four lines, specifically providing for the reference, were actually taken, in substance, from the recent rules of the Supreme Court providing for references to masters in chancery.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. COVINGTON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to inquire as to the procedure where a case was brought in equity and the court, in view of the testimony, if it deemed it proper to refer it to the commission, did so refer it, whether the commission has any power to take such testimony except that testimony already taken by the court?

Mr. COVINGTON. Absolutely none. There was no question in the committee but that such a course would constitute a bald invasion of the constitutional rights of the defendant. He would not have his day in court. It does just what Judge Towner has so accurately expressed—it has provided this machinery in a rather happy way and imposed on the commission practically the function of a master in chancery.

Mr. MADDEN. I was afraid that the words "refer said suits to the commission to ascertain and report" gave the commission power to take evidence.

Mr. COVINGTON. No. That language is universally accepted by the courts to mean simply referring the actual record papers in the case.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. COVINGTON. I do.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am interested in the gentleman's statement. In order that the matter may not be misunderstood, although my colleague has expressed it clearly, the committee should observe this language:

If it—

That is, the court—

shall be then of opinion that the complainant is entitled to relief.

In other words, the court has reached an opinion, and the reference is not upon subsequent evidence, but upon the existing record at that time, in order that the decree may be effective in carrying out that opinion.

Mr. COVINGTON. That is precisely the condition that will exist. The judgment of the court will already have been arrived at. The reference will be after the decree is determined to be entered against the defendant.

Mr. MADDEN. I am not a lawyer, but a business man, and am one who might possibly be affected by an investigation of the commission at some time. I was afraid that they might have the power to take evidence that had not already been given in the court.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. COVINGTON. I yield for a question.

Mr. FOWLER. The point brought out by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] is the very point that impressed me as the reason for delay. After the court has made up its mind that relief ought to be granted, then if it is referred to another body it occasions an opportunity for delay, and that is the question that was worrying me in the matter.

Mr. COVINGTON. I appreciate the good intentions of the gentleman from Illinois, and I know what is running through his mind, but the committee was abundantly satisfied that delay would not be the actual result in practice.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. COVINGTON. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is customary, after the court has arrived at a general conclusion in the case, that the attorneys of the case should participate in drawing the decree, and they do usually participate in drawing it, do they not?

Mr. COVINGTON. They do, as a matter of fact.

Mr. ADAMSON. Now, when attorneys have some difficulty in agreeing upon the form of the decree and the court and attorneys have some embarrassment about it, they will find in this commission a body of very able men, conversant with the subject and fully acquainted with all the details of the business which is before the court, and is it not exceedingly appropriate that for that reason the form of that decree should be referred to such a board as that, in order to aid the court and the lawyers in its preparation?

The Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce in its report to the Senate on February 26, 1913, on this subject, said:

One of the most serious problems in connection with suits brought under the antitrust act is to find the proper method of disintegrating combinations that have been adjudged unlawful. The dissolution of a corporation or a series of associated corporations must often involve the consideration of plans for reorganization in order that the property which has been unlawfully employed may thereafter be lawfully used in commerce. The courts are not fitted for the work of reconstruction, and whatever jurisdiction they now have or that may hereafter be conferred upon them with respect to such matters, it can not be gainsaid that a commission the members of which are in close touch with business affairs, and who are intimately acquainted with the commercial situation, might be extremely helpful in the required adjustment.

And in referring to this section in the pending bill one of the most experienced trust prosecutors of the Government has recently said:

This is a most useful provision. Many of the suits instituted under the antitrust laws cover the entire range of an industry, and where combinations complained of are adjudged unlawful the working out of the appropriate relief often involves intricate problems of trade, finance, and economics. It would be a great relief to the Department of Justice and to the courts if it were possible to refer such problems to such a body as the proposed interstate trade commission.

Mr. Chairman, let me now take up another important function. The commission is required upon its own initiative by section 13 to see that the execution of any decree against any corporation to prevent or restrain a violation of the antitrust acts is effective. It has been repeatedly said by authorities upon this subject that there must be some independent and impartial body charged with the duty to see to the continued performance, subject to the direction of the court, of such decrees. The commission is to make investigations whenever necessary for the purpose of enforcing that effective disintegration of a combination in restraint of trade contemplated by the decree of court, and it must transmit to the Attorney General a report showing the manner in which the decree is being carried out so that application may be made at once to the court for any supplemental order necessary to the proper and continued enforcement of its decree.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, if the gentleman finds a corporation which had been dissolved violating the decree, would it be the duty of the commission to report that case to the Attorney General?

Mr. COVINGTON. The bill so states, and the Attorney General would then, in the usual procedure appear in court and ask an order to have the appropriate corrective process, by a proceeding for contempt or otherwise, adjudged against those who had been guilty of the violation.

That this is regarded by informed persons as a most vital function, I quote from an article by Mr. Samuel Untermyer, the widely known New York lawyer, in a recent number of the North American Review:

It should be the province of the trade commission, and of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the case of railroads, to perform for the courts the burden of framing plans of segregation and readjustment of unlawful combinations, subject to the approval of the court, and to retain jurisdiction, under the direction of the court, so as to see the proper enforcement of the decree. Until we have such a body charged with that duty there will be no such thing as an effective dissolution of unlawful combinations.

And The Outlook of February 14, 1914, while urging other functions for a trade commission consistent with the Progressive Party theory of licensing monopoly, at the same time declares, as one of the most important functions of such an independent body, that—

Whenever by a decree of court a combination is declared to be monopolistic and is ordered to be dissolved, the Federal trade commission should be given the authority and duty of administering the decree of dissolution, with full power to decide what it is necessary for the combination to do in order that the purpose of the decree be carried out.

And the same able attorney for the Government in trust cases above quoted, in referring to this proposed power says:

The usefulness of this provision is patent. Complaints are frequently made of alleged violations of decrees entered in suits under the anti-trust act, and their investigation would be greatly facilitated if made one of the principal duties of a permanent body clothed with power to require witnesses to testify and to compel the production of books and papers. As the law now stands such complaints must be investigated by agents of the department without the aid of compulsory process.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COVINGTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SCOTT. Aside from this power conferred by section 13, following the final decree, is it claimed for this bill that the commission to be created possesses any other inherent powers than those now possessed by the Bureau of Corporations?

Mr. COVINGTON. I have stated three very distinct, broad powers not now possessed by the Bureau of Corporations.

Mr. SCOTT. Perhaps the gentleman does not understand. I would not classify as inherent powers the powers stated by the gentleman. For instance, the powers initiated by the President or the Attorney General, or to be exercised only upon direction of those officials, can hardly be said to be inherent. True, the commission performs certain functions after the action has been initiated by these other officers, but has the commission any other power than the present power in and of itself, acting upon its own initiative, outside of section 13?

Mr. COVINGTON. Oh, yes. If the gentleman was present during the earlier part of my remarks he must recall that I pointed out, at least to the best of my ability, that the power to gather the annual reports and the special reports which are to comprise the great body of information, producing that publicity which a great many men in America believe will be a great and salient safeguard for honest business in the future, is not a power now possessed by the Bureau of Corporations. It can not classify corporations nor segregate the smaller concerns into those classes which ought not to be burdened by the requirement for reports, while at the same time requiring reports from those which, notwithstanding their smallness, are so operating as to need that great check which would come from publicity of their acts.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. If the gentleman will yield, I will simply remind the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SCOTT] that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON] has already said that the power exercised under section 13 was exercised on the initiative of the commission.

Mr. SCOTT. I mentioned that. I will say to the gentleman that I was present during all of his remarks, and I thought I followed him quite closely; but it occurred to me that an examination of the section to which the gentleman referred showed that that was not a power of the commission at all, but a provision of the statute imposing those duties upon the corporation; and the corporation does not act in response to a requirement of the commission, or under any power exercised by the commission, but under the direct requirement of this statute. And in that respect the power of the commission is not enlarged.

Mr. COVINGTON. If the gentleman dwells upon that technical construction which differentiates between the powers inherent in the commission and the imperative duties to be performed by corporations at the instance of the commission, that is true. But I take it that in legislating in a broad way the true test by which such a bill as this must be judged is whether there are or are not in it valuable provisions guaranteeing to the American people, either through the inherent power of the commission itself or through the legislative provisions of the bill, which fasten on the corporations specific duties, effective powers which make for the welfare of the people and safeguard their interest as against the unlawful aggressions of the big corporations of this country. I know the gentleman would not want to split hairs on whether or not these are inherent powers when he comes to reflect.

Mr. SCOTT. I hope the gentleman will not think that I am criticizing the bill, but it occurred to me that it was quite material to be considered whether or not these obligations that are imposed on the corporation by the law were to be enforced by a commission or whether it stands as a mere statute to be enforced through the courts in the ordinary way.

Mr. COVINGTON. There is a penalty to be enforced through the courts. I see the gentleman's point of view.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COVINGTON. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman tell me how it is possible for this proposed commission to have any inherent power? Is it not entirely dependent upon the provision of law creating it for all authority?

Mr. COVINGTON. I assumed that the gentleman from Iowa meant inherent in the sense of any power that we conferred upon the commission.

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does not the gentleman from Maryland think, and did not he write the provision with that view, that it will be the duty of the commission, if the bill goes through in the present form, to keep itself thoroughly posted under the law at all times as to the condition and all the details of all the business institutions in and above the class that is made the minimum in the bill?

Mr. COVINGTON. Yes.

Mr. LEVY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COVINGTON. I will.

Mr. LEVY. Is there any way under this bill by which you can avoid the interference of all these investigators at once? For instance, the Attorney General and the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Interstate Trade Commission, and the Department of Labor might all at one and the same time investigate the same corporation. Is not there some way by which you can provide that an investigation shall be made only by this commission? For instance, we have in New York 13 or 14 inspectors of buildings, and very often they all come to inspect the property at one and the same time. Now, I am not criticizing the gentleman's bill, but I want to know if there is not a way by which the Interstate Trade Commission can take the responsibility of all these other investigators and make the investigation, instead of having three or four made at once?

Mr. COVINGTON. When the bill goes into effect and the commission is appointed, it will be the only body that will have power under the Federal Government to make any investigations into the interstate-commerce business of corporations.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it intended to have some uniform method of summarizing the reports?

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I will state that the commission in one section is given ample power to formulate uniform rules and regulations for the entire operation of its work and for everything pertaining to its investigations and reports.

Mr. MADDEN. Not to endeavor to invade the methods of conducting business, bookkeeping, and that sort of thing?

Mr. COVINGTON. After careful consideration, the committee was a unit in the opinion that at this time the widely different methods of industrial business, their varied schemes of accounting, each sufficient, perhaps, to itself, would not permit this commission successfully to create a uniform system of accounting.

Mr. MADDEN. I am very glad the committee did not do that, because every line of business has its own particular line of accounting, and it would not fit into any other line of business in any way.

Mr. COVINGTON. That is precisely the opinion that this committee arrived at after quite an exhaustive discussion.

Mr. Chairman, on April 17, 1914, that very able independent newspaper, the Springfield Republican, said of this whole bill and its purpose for the benefit of the business people of the United States:

The majority of the House Interstate Commerce Committee wisely reports concerning the scope of the commission's powers, that only experience can be depended upon to develop them in accordance with the demonstrated needs of the country. The history of the Interstate Commerce Commission in relation to railroads shows a gradual evolution of function which could not wisely have been hastened by arbitrary legislative fiat. The development of the interstate trade commission may well be left to future requirements and the unmistakable demands of the people.

Mr. Chairman, as I stated in the report presented to the House on this bill, the commission has in no sense been empowered to make terms with monopoly or in any way to assume control of business. Such matters are of a most delicate, complex, and doubtful nature, and their advocates seemed all too desirous that the Government should make itself initially responsible for corporate activities conceived perhaps with such subtlety that the dangers to the public might develop only after sad experience. There has been no attempt to deal with the question of maintenance of fixed prices. The commission has been given no power to pass orders in any way regulating production. It has not been clothed with authority to make a declaration as to the innocuousness of any particular corporation or agreement, even if coupled with the right to revoke such order in the future.

All those problems are interwoven with the industrial business of the country in such a way as to be effectively legislated upon, if at all, only after the most exhaustive investigation by trained experts. The hearings before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce of a year and a half ago and the hearings before this committee during the pendency of the present bill did not produce any information which would warrant an attempt at an intelligent and sound legislation upon them.

It must be remembered that this commission enters a new field of governmental activity. The history of the Interstate Commerce Commission is conclusive evidence that the best legislation regarding many of the problems to come before the Interstate Trade Commission will be produced from time to time as the result of the reports of the commission after exhaustive inquiries and investigations. No one can foretell the extent to which the complex interstate business of a great country like the United States may require, alike for the benefit of the business man and for the protection of the public, new legislation in the form of Federal regulations, but such legislation should come by a sound process of evolution. Even the control of the railways in this country by the Interstate Commerce Commission affords no complete parallel to administrative control of the industrial corporations of the country by a Federal commission. It is largely the experience of the independent commission itself that will afford Congress the accurate information necessary to give to the country from time to time the additional legislation which may be needed.

There has already come an awakened public conscience to correct the shortcomings and evils of government that have grown up in America as a result of that smug complacency which seems to have gone hand in hand with our tremendous material progress and prosperity. The people have come to a better understanding of the genesis of our institutions, and they realize that our country's greatness must consist, not merely in the wealth of its inhabitants, not in the extent of its territory, but in the capacity of its citizens to maintain justice and liberty through the agency of self-government. The vast majority of the evils still existing in the industrial world will be in the future corrected by that pitiless publicity which will make the man of devious ways an object of reproach among his fellow men. Where publicity fails to be a sufficient corrective I think we have provided, in the proposed bill to create the Interstate Trade Commission, ample powers to promote beneficent legislation and to aid the existing administrative machinery of the Federal courts to an extent not now anywhere authorized.

If this commission shall be created, the clear vision, ripe experience, and abiding patriotism of the President can be depended upon to select for its membership men of the character and capacity to make it in its field as great a success as the Interstate Commerce Commission. And the country may with full assurance feel that it will perform services that will be of inestimable advantage to the business and the future of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be notified at the end of 20 minutes.

The Republicans upon the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce realized that there was a severe responsibility upon them; that the general subject concretely presented in this measure had been discussed before the country for several years; that the establishment of a trade commission of some sort had been generally acceptable to the business world; that the leading publicists, economists, and men of affairs, whose judgments are of consequence in our country, had almost unanimously advocated such a plan; and especially it had been approved by the leaders of the Republican Party. President Taft in his messages in 1911 and 1912 especially recommended a plan for national control and incorporation of concerns doing an interstate business, and the Republican national platform of 1912 also in a plank especially recommended the creation of a commission with somewhat the powers that are contained in this bill. I insert the plank of the Republican platform, as follows:

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

In the enforcement and administration of Federal laws governing interstate commerce and enterprises impressed with a public use engaged therein, there is much that may be committed to a Federal trade commission, thus placing in the hands of an administrative board many of the functions now necessarily exercised by the courts. This will promote promptness in the administration of the laws and avoid delays and technicalities incident to court procedure.

The Republican platform went a little beyond the provisions of this measure in evidently intending some administrative sections in the bill. The Republicans of the committee did not feel authorized at this time to strongly insist upon any such concrete provisions, much as some believed in their efficacy and necessity. We could all agree upon a commission which should have the most ample power to require reports, conduct investigations, secure publicity, assist the courts, give information, and study and recommend suitable legislation.

Attorney General Wickersham, as the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON] has stated, in his report for 1912 recommended some phases of this bill which have been most valuable, and the report of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce in 1911 outlined the substance of this measure, which met general acceptation. There is nothing novel or startling here, but it is the beginning of a most beneficent plan for the real relief of the business affairs of this country if it shall be established and administered in the spirit with which your committee has reported it to you.

As the Republican members of the committee stated in their minority report:

For many years all legislation in this committee has been considered upon its merits, without regard to partisan lines or influences. The subject matter of this bill was recommended to Congress by the President and has been properly made a matter of importance by the present administration. The Republican members of the committee realized the great interest in it by the business organizations and thoughtful citizens interested in the public welfare, as well as its consequence and opportunity for good to the people of the country. Thus its consideration has proceeded with a sincere desire on our part to assist in the preparation of the legislation along the lines which would seem to meet both the public expectations and necessities, and yet not be oppressive so as to injure individual effort and initiative.

The majority members of the committee have freely conferred with the members of the minority and have received their cordial cooperation in the formulation of this measure. The legislation as reported is such in general as we approve, although individual differences necessarily exist as to the wisdom and scope of some of its provisions and details.

So that the minority members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce were very glad to cooperate with our friends of the majority in the framing of this legislation, and especially those of us who were on the subcommittee, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] and the gentleman from California [Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND], are very glad to state to the House that our ideas and theories and our services were very courteously received, and that we did cooperate very sincerely in the framing of this measure, and are very glad to support it as a general proposition. There may be some details, as we stated in our report, which we may call to the attention of the House, but as a general proposition we are very glad to cooperate and support it. But there is another suggestion which should be had in mind—not only is this along the line of Republican suggestions and of true Republican doctrine, but we realize that our Democratic brethren have a right to borrow from our stock whatever they may think of value. We can not complain if we would at this administration taking possession of our property. Not so very long ago some of our Republican administrations had been accustomed to abstract some of the treasures of your Democratic platforms without any especial credit for it, and we turned them to our advantage without any thanks to you. So turn about is fair play. [Applause.]

SUPERVISES METHODS.

The particular reason why this measure should be considered at this time is this: This bill supervises the mechanism and the methods of trade, the movement of goods or commodities, from the man who produces to the man who consumes them. This mechanism and these methods and these commercial processes are the very essence of trade. This exchange is the essence of material civilization itself by which men get along one with the other and assist each other in human progress. The various appurtenances of such trade and exchange have been under supervision and regulation for years by the National and State Governments. Transportation has been regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission, finance is now regulated by the Treasury reserve board, and for years past the Treasury Department, in a way, through its internal revenue has regulated many other business activities. Then we have our food and drug acts, those regulating the weights and measures, and many other activities, incidents, or appurtenances of commerce have been regulated or supervised by the National Government. But this measure reaches to commerce itself, to its machinery and methods and processes by which it exists and flourishes and confers its inestimable blessings, or, on the other hand, is misused for purposes of extortion and oppression.

Other nations have done this before us, and have had some similar supervisory authority and have established administrative bodies to correct admitted evils and oppressions in the domain of commerce. Some of the States also have done this, as has been very thoroughly shown by the Committee on the Judiciary in their collection of statutes of States and foreign nations. So that it is now incumbent upon the National Government to do its share for the enlightenment and protection of our trade and people in interstate and foreign commerce, embracing a large majority of such activities in the daily life of our Nation.

PRESENT NECESSITY.

The necessity is now pressing. Our people now number nearly 100,000,000, and are the most active and aggressive in the world. They have become educated and broadened so that their desires and necessities have increased in a vastly greater ratio than their numbers. Our means of communication and transportation have developed so very rapidly that our domestic commerce is equal to the foreign commerce of the whole globe. The inventions used and practiced in the arts and sciences have multiplied infinitely with the last generation. Our matchless resources have been developed so tremendously that gigantic organizations have seemed necessary to profitably, or at least adequately, carry on the business affairs growing out of such stupendous growth, to supply the wants and necessities and possibilities of our people. Vast wealth has been accumulated, especially in the hands of a few, irresponsible except to their own consciences and sense of justice and patriotism, and these powers have become so concentrated and involved that disentanglement is extremely difficult.

From this situation the great mass of our people have a very just apprehension that this wealth, and power growing out of it, may be not only used to the detriment but also may be a potential source of injury and oppression.

Nobody is particularly blamable for this condition. It has been a necessary coincident with the tremendous growth of our country and its business affairs.

The National and State Governments have fostered these processes and yet have not sought to adequately curb the abuses. This measure should be an intelligent beginning.

It is time that we knew exactly what the facts are and have the machinery to keep in touch and step with any future development, so that there may be considered and formulated the proper public measures for protecting our people and the general business interests of the country, because we conceive that business itself needs such information and protection equally with the mass of the people.

Most citizens are patriotic, honest, fair, and broad-minded, and desirous of doing right. But we all realize that there must be a few irresponsible, greedy, unscrupulous, and capable men who will use all of these vast agencies for their own selfish ends. This necessarily compels their competitors to adopt somewhat similar means in order to maintain themselves. So that unless some higher power, like the Government, intervenes and protects and encourages the good citizens, oppression and disaster necessarily result.

This bill does exactly those two things. It furnishes a means of information for the people, the business interests, and the Government and its officials; and, secondly, it outlines as clearly as may be legislation for administrative guidance and assistance wherever it may be found necessary.

PROTECTS INSTITUTIONS.

Mr. Chairman, this bill may delve even deeper than merely such guidance and assistance.

The very foundation of our institutions may be protected by a measure of this kind. Republican institutions, free institutions, can only exist where the people are intelligent, self-controlled, satisfied that they are having a fair chance in life, devoted to our institutions, and fairly well contented with existing conditions and prospects for the future. Unless these conditions do exist, the people do not and can not believe in their institutions and the Government based on them. Unless they do, free institutions can not last. We know that there is a spirit of unrest abroad. We know that there is a prevalent dissatisfaction with existing conditions and prospects for the future at the hands of the responsible servants of the people. The people have the right to look to us to ascertain what evils there really are and what remedies may be necessary, and at the same time preserve the inestimable blessings of our system of government and the wonderful efficiency and progress of our business affairs. This measure, by furnishing a medium for acquiring the information which has been outlined so ably and comprehensively by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON], by opening the avenues for guidance and assistance, by outlining opportunities for cooperation, by regulating the efficiency of our organizations and institutions so that the people can get the benefit of that efficiency, can maintain a prosperity for the masses of our people, can assure them that their Government continues for their benefit, can assure stability and harmony and in such way conduce to the general satisfaction with our institutions. This may be only a dream, but it is one of the possibilities of hope, latent in this apparently simple measure.

ECONOMIC STUDIES.

This commission, established by this bill, must undertake in the near future some lines of research of inestimable value to our people and their business methods. If most of us thought that this measure would remain as it now stands, as a finality, I have no doubt that none of us would approve it, because the Bureau of Corporations could be extended to accomplish the express requirements of this bill. We believe that it is to be the beginning of something which will work out for the lasting benefit of the American people, and that it must lead the way with intelligence, sincerity, and a patriotic and practical broad-mindedness in setting forth some solutions of our troublesome, intricate, and possibly dangerous social and economic problems. We realize that we have a most complex political and industrial organism, probably the most complex in the world, to carry on the most intricate and tremendous daily business of our people, and that this commission will touch the nerve center of this great complex national structure. We realize there are vast economic and social forces constantly changing conditions, as the material and human bases change. What can this commission do to enlighten and lead us as to them? To me it would seem that this commission must undertake at once two classes of investigations and studies: First, what must be done with the economic, social, and political situations in this country as regulated by the Sherman antitrust law; and, secondly, whether the best way to handle this complex corporate situation must or not be through direct national control by a national act of incorporation for concerns doing such a business. First, as to the Sherman antitrust law, I think we all realize the fundamental soundness of it and that it is probably the best drafted statute designed to accomplish the contemplated results which has ever been placed upon our statute books.

SHERMAN ANTITRUST LAW.

The general beneficent purposes of it must not be abandoned and should not be radically changed. But this commission can profitably consider whether something can be worked out for the benefit of the whole people which should increase the general national efficiency as well as more surely provide for improved protection and justice. But the basis of the statute must continue, as its fundamental principle for centuries have, as the foundation for the well-being and well-doing of our citizenship and their material industry. In its form the Sherman antitrust law can not be well improved.

It is comprehensive; it is clear; and, considering its scope, it is strong and certain when one understands its history and its construction and interpretation by the thorough analysis of our courts for nearly a quarter of a century. No one can question but that it has been of inestimable benefit to our people, and that it has saved us from great evils. Some of these conditions yet exist, and will always exist so long as does human nature, with its greed, ambitions, and infirmities. So that the strong, restraining force of such a law is clearly necessary to protect the welfare and opportunities of the mass of the people. Yet at the same time there have arisen social and economic questions in consequence of such a statute which now thrust themselves upon us and we must heed them. Testimony has come before your Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the Judiciary that there is an economic side to these regulatory measures which is pressing upon us. Any comprehensive, repressive statute like the Sherman antitrust law may not be entirely economic in all of the operations, and in many instances it may be construed to impede the necessary progress or diminish the necessary rights and privileges of our people and their daily business. So that one of the first things which this commission must investigate and report to us is what, if anything, should be done concerning a modification of the Sherman antitrust law. Let me illustrate some of the ramifications which have appeared in the discussions before our committee and, I think, before the Committee on the Judiciary, as I have examined their hearings.

MODIFICATIONS.

The leaders of labor claim that their natural, God-given right to cooperate for their mutual protection and benefit is practically taken away from them, as this act has been construed. They claim, and justly, that such cooperation is necessary for their protection and that of society, and so demand that they shall be exempt from the operations of the Sherman antitrust law. Every patriotic citizen desires the best possible opportunity for the wageworkers of this country to cooperate for their own welfare. They do not desire and no one desires for them that such organizations shall be used oppressively to the great mass of the people. So the proper modification should be carefully investigated, to encourage necessary protection and yet not allow oppression. The farmers and the agricultural organizations also insist that they shall be exempt for the reason that it is necessary for their welfare and the general welfare of this country that they should cooperate to get their products to market properly and to the best advantage of all. The retail organizations of this country appeared before us, and I think also before the Committee on the Judiciary, and asked that they be allowed to have a modification of the Sherman antitrust law so that they can make trade agreements and maintain themselves in competition with the chain stores and the department stores and the other organizations which are slowly crushing the independent retailers and smaller merchants of the country. The druggists and grocers and other organizations of that kind made very impressive arguments as to why they too should be allowed to have some trade agreements.

Certain classes of manufacturers producing specialities presented reasons why they should have a right to make trade agreements to maintain the quality of their goods and maintain equal prices to consumers everywhere and at all times, so that everybody should be assured of equal treatment in the use of their products. The exporters also appeared and showed the necessity of maintaining suitable and adequate organizations and utilize trade agreements as to our export trade, so that our people and our exporters could compete on equal terms with those of other nations in the markets of the world. Other nations strongly and efficiently assist their export trade in many ways. This Nation can not afford to lag behind, and our exporters insisted that something must be done to give them the right standing and proper governmental protection in competition with foreign concerns, which are encouraged by their Governments to make any sort of combinations and agreements necessary to secure the world's business. These conditions are entirely different in this struggle for foreign business than as to our domestic affairs.

We have had experience among the users of water power, who insist that they must also have some modification of the economic principle of the Sherman antitrust law, that our great water powers should be developed economically, so that capital can be persuaded to invest and utilize our natural resources for the benefit of our people. We were shown that unless this can be done it will be impossible to secure capital and economically utilize this most important and valuable natural resource.

The producers of coal and lumber made very impressive statements to your committees, showing that because of excessive competition and inability to make proper trade agreements large waste was necessary in both lines of industry; that in order to cheapen production under such stress of competition a considerable portion of coal and lumber could not be profitably taken from the mines or forest and marketed to advantage. If trade agreements could be had under proper supervision, this waste could be avoided and there would be large savings of our natural products, with the resultant benefits to our people by preserving a considerable portion of our natural resources. An estimate of some of the coal miners was in many localities that nearly one-half of the possible production was wasted in this way, which could be saved by proper trade agreements. This is of immense importance, as we all realize. We know that public carriers are forbidden to make trade agreements, and yet are practically obliged to maintain the same schedules of rates in traffic, which must be just and reasonable for all, between competing points, in order to avoid rate wars, which were not only the ruin of the carriers but also were of the greatest injury to the affected communities.

You will realize that these are very serious economic questions, which must be considered by this commission at once, but not too hastily, as they touch the very foundation of our business affairs. You can realize from this slight summary that this is only a beginning of a tremendously important work for this commission for the people of this country.

NATIONAL INCORPORATION.

Then there is another branch of the problem which must be studied: What is the effect of the diverse incorporation laws of our States in working out the business welfare of this country and the control of the evil practices? Shall there be allowed to continue the present system by which the States have the sole right to incorporate and prescribe the powers and limits of corporate activities, with the temptation, for the sake of getting some local business, to encourage the use of too ample and diversified corporate powers; or should there be a national incorporation law so that the Nation itself can control its interstate and foreign business as best suited to a nation's welfare? The powers and limits of incorporation may be the very basis for wrongdoing or of successful conduct of business. What would be the best policy for the control of these great business concerns having in view the interests and welfare of the whole people? My own judgment is clear that the national authority is necessary and that we should have an affirmative action or pressure upon them, rather than to rely and exercise only a negative control by means of rigid and often uneconomic prohibitions. This can be worked out intelligently and, I believe, acceptably by such a trade commission.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Would that require a constitutional amendment?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I think not.

Mr. MADDEN. Would the National Government have the right to take away the power of the States?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; not take away the power of the States, but just give permissive authority to the business interests to incorporate where the National Government has such special jurisdiction as it has over interstate and foreign commerce. I think there can be no doubt about that.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. With pleasure.

Mr. BARTLETT. Can the gentleman tell us what rights have not been taken away from the States?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I agree with the gentleman from Georgia in his suggestion, but I do not care to discuss that question at this time. The most of them that have been taken away have been recently taken away by the gentleman's own side of the House. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. BARTLETT. I realize that there are getting to be more State-rights Republicans than there remain State-rights Democrats. [Laughter.] Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman referred to the Sherman antitrust law and its power and efficiency. Is it not a fact that in the judicial history of that law there has never come before the courts a case of alleged violation of the antitrust law to be considered where the law has not been maintained and where the corporation has not been decided against? Is not that true, except in the Knight case?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; except in the Knight case.

Mr. BARTLETT. And that went off on a question of jurisdiction and not upon a question of law.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes. If the pleadings had been properly framed it probably would have been decided differently. At least that is the general expression.

Mr. BARTLETT. So that this law that has been for 24 years on the statute books has, during its 20 years in the courts, been established as an effective weapon in the hands of the courts and in the hands of the people for upholding the principles embodied in that antitrust law?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. There can be no question about that.

Mr. BARTLETT. So that does no the gentleman think—I think so myself—that we ought to be exceedingly careful, after that law has been thus administered and thus interpreted and thus construed, how we venture upon new and untried fields, where the courts must again enter upon a domain of investigation and decision?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I am very glad that the gentleman has called attention to that situation, because it is exactly what the committee had in mind and I was trying to state. I have called the attention of this committee to some of the phases of our commercial activity that do necessitate examination by the commission. But we are confronted with these economic and social considerations. We realize there may be too rigid prohibitions against cooperation, which may result in injustice to labor and producers and waste and inefficiency in other lines of production. No one desires that. We realize it will not do to allow the bars again to be thrown down and all sorts of combinations and agreements allowed to be made and flourish. Now, what can we do in the general interest and for the general welfare of the whole people, to allow such cooperation as shall preserve the good without encouraging the bad elements of society, and what sort of restriction must we have for the bad which will not at the same time repress and eliminate the good? That is exactly the problem which must be put before such a commission at the outset. It must find some method of separating the sheep from the goats. Negative prohibitory legislation has not proved effective or satisfactory. Affirmative legislation may be worse unless framed with the utmost care, intelligence, fairness, and patriotism.

I believe this commission should blaze the way for such a consummation. That is my chief hope and desire in the formulation of this measure.

At the same time I realize fully the tremendous force of what the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] has just stated. There should not be any modification of the exceedingly effective Sherman law, until after the right kind of a commission had investigated the whole situation with the utmost care and indicated what could be done and what bounds should be set to any modification, because I think we all agree that the welfare of our people requires that the general principles of the Sherman law must be maintained; and if any modification is made, we must determine what can be done, and an adequate administrative authority must be created to supervise and regulate those who might operate under them.

Mr. BARTLETT. And that is in the interest of the people and not in the interest of the corporations.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. This must all be done with an eye single to the welfare of the people, and not in the interest of anyone who may desire these modifications. That has been the difficulty in all of this class of legislation. We have heard from those whose personal interests lie in making these modifications. We should have the experienced judgment of an expert body as to the effect on the people at large of any proposed change before we could adopt it. I believe such to be necessary, and I am glad of this suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. And the course which the gentleman suggests is not a course that is in the interest of the corporations, but in the interest of the people themselves. Having found a good law, and it being enforced, we ought to be careful not to change it in such a way as to make it less effectual.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No change ought to be made unless it is clearly shown to be in the interest of the people and clearly regulated, so that we may be sure it is within the proper bounds and in the public interest. My own idea is that not only must an expert commission study and outline first the changes which could and should be made in the interest of the whole people, and not merely those who ask for it, but there must be some restrictions and limitations and administrative supervision in the interest of the people before we can safely make any changes. What these must be should be carefully worked out in advance and the consequences realized before we leap.

Congress and its committees have not the information or the time or the environment to properly do this. We should have at hand the best possible official advice, assistance, and cooperation and then know that the duties we prescribe will be properly performed. This is too serious a matter for us to go aflight without consideration. It is easy to promise the interested parties, and be a good fellow, and let down the bars to all who clamor to be exempt from the rigid requirements of the Sherman law; but it seems to me a patriotic duty upon us, as the representatives of the whole people, to insist upon intelligent and conscientious study, discussion, and protection to the great mass of the people before we make any serious changes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Do I understand the gentleman that the question whether the Sherman law should be modified with respect to these matters of which he has spoken will be a part of the work of the commission?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; in the line of investigation of the work of corporations and the processes of corporate activities and practices.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Do I understand the gentleman further that the bill now before us provides for that?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Practically; yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It provides for investigation and reports.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] has consumed 20 minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will be obliged to the Chairman if he will call my attention when I have consumed five minutes more.

The Interstate Trade Commission will have plenary power to investigate under the acts now existing as to the Bureau of Corporations. It can obtain any sort of information it may find necessary under that section. But it can also obtain any sort of information under section 9 which annual or special reports can furnish, and it is granted the right to have expert assistance within or without the governmental service to pursue this line of research and study and recommendation. All branches of the Government can contribute to its tasks. The Interstate Commerce Commission can enlighten as to the effect and the problems of transportation; the Treasury and its agencies as to the financial situation and as to corporations. The Department of Commerce can assist as to statistics and whatever may be necessary as to the machinery of commerce. The Departments of Interior, Agriculture, Labor, Post Office, and Justice can all assist, and outside experts can be made available. Thus the machinery and means for a proper study of these most important subjects have been provided in this measure, and this commission directs them all to do it. It must be done, and now is the opportunity to have it properly done.

Mr. BARTLETT. Under section 17, which specifically gives this commission the power, and requires them also to report, it is provided that the report shall also include recommendations as to such additional legislation as the commission may deem advisable.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes. It is perfectly clear that the real object of this commission is to study these economic questions and the incidental questions which grow out of them, such as the relative efficiency between big business and little business, between cooperation, combination, and competition, if there can be any differentiation in the studies as to these methods. The Bureau of Corporations is already studying these subjects. They are being discussed all over the country, and have been discussed more or less before our committee. But this new commission will undoubtedly discuss and consider them at an early date and give whatever information it can to assist us and the people in working out their industrial salvation.

There has been set forth more or less in various discussions the different views as to competition and cooperation and combination in preserving industrial activities. The commission will be obliged to investigate and consider those phases of our industrial situation; not to lay down any hard and fast rules, because that is the one thing we do not desire to have done, but to present the various phases of the question to the public and to Congress, so that the industrial classes of this country and the business classes of this country can know what is the exact situation—what is proposed and best to do, how it would work and how to protect themselves—and if legislation shall be necessary, then enlighten Congress exactly as to what ought to be done and what would be the probable results of our action. Especially, as I have said before, would it be necessary to establish suitable administrative and supervisory machinery to insure the proper results for the people.

Mr. METZ. In connection with section 2, on page 3, among other detailed matters, you provide that the expenses of members of the commission and employees shall be paid.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. METZ. In a recent appropriation bill we limited the expenses for officials of the Government to $5 a day. Take, for instance, the Board of General Appraisers. They are limited to that amount. Now, how will this commission stand in regard to that?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I presume it would come under the general law.

Mr. METZ. These men have to go all over the country, from here to San Francisco, and it is out of the question that they should be expected to travel and pay hotel expenses on $4 or $5 a day. It is a good thing to have that in mind in connection with this commission.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I am glad that the gentleman from New York has called that to our minds. I presume such an act would apply, and it might be burdensome. There is one thing to be also considered, and that is that it is extremely difficult to frame this sort of legislation in a satisfactory way if, at present, it contains any substantial or affirmative provisions. With all due respect to two eminent gentlemen who have delivered messages on this subject, the present Chief Executive and the one who preceded him, it is comparatively easy to prepare and read delightful messages on broad economic subjects from that desk. We all enjoy them and profit exceedingly from them. But it is a mighty different proposition to sit at a committee table and frame a bill which shall adequately meet the situations outlined in those messages.

There have been various criticisms of Congress in the public press and on the floor, that we are only rubber stamping the will of the Executive. I wish to say about the formulation of this measure that it was really perfected by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with all of its defects and all of its virtues. The subcommittee worked for weeks, and we received less assistance from the executive departments in formulating this measure than as to any great measure I have known to come from that committee during my service of 12 years on the committee. [Applause.]

At one time I thought the executive departments had been somewhat remiss in extending their assistance, and I criticized them for not doing what I thought they ought to do to further assist the committee and the subcommittee in the formulation of the various intricate provisions of the measure. I realize that they desired to assist us, but they did not desire to press too vigorously their views upon us, but as requested they rendered all the assistance they could.

OBJECTIONS.

Now, there are two classes of objections to this bill which have been outlined so very ably by the gentleman from Maryland—one class, who think that we have not done enough, and the other class, who think that we have done too much.

As to the first, those who think we have not done enough, we have only this to say: In the first place, we did not desire to exceed the jurisdiction which the House conferred upon the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. We realize that the substantial parts of this subject were within the jurisdiction of another committee, and we did not desire to trench upon the prerogatives of any other committee of the House. But especially we did not believe we had sufficient information as to what substantive changes should be placed in a law of this kind until after a most careful and exhaustive investigation by a trained body of experts, such as provided by the bill itself. Such substantive acts would give rise to most important and delicate constitutional, economic, and social questions. So whatever changes should be made in the substantive law should be such as to advance the interests of and protect the people and not lead to uncertainty, harassing regulations, and rigid requirements without beneficial results. We did not think we could do this extremely important and intricate subject the justice it deserved within the limits of our time and information before us. That is one reason, and that is the one reason, we did not go further.

Again we realized, as the gentleman from Maryland stated, that we did not want to cast any cloud, at the present time, over the business affairs of this country. We wanted that this measure should be regarded as an assistance to business affairs, that it should give accurate information and be of genuine help, and for that reason just at this time, Republicans as we are, anxious for our party's success, realizing that the party in power is charged for good and evil, yet we wish to do all within our power to sincerely help the business affairs of this country. [Applause.]

We did not think under the present circumstances it was safe or fair to go any further. We may be obliged to do so before this bill shall be finally enacted.

ADVERSE CRITICISM.

Now as to those who think we have done too much. Undoubtedly you gentlemen have received circulars from the Chamber of Commerce and the Board of Trade and Transportation of the city of New York, two of the greatest commercial organizations in the country, protesting against this sort of legislation. They are eminent and able gentlemen, some of whom have testified before our committee, but they do not seem to realize that the world does move.

Mr. METZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. METZ. I am a member of the Chamber of Commerce, and I want to say that that bill to which the circular relates was a former bill that was talked about and not the present bill at all. I believe there is no objection to this present measure on the part of anyone.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I am glad the gentleman has made that statement.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. I think the gentleman who has been recently elected president of the Chamber of Commerce of New York appeared before the committee and strongly favored the bill.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; I am glad the gentleman from New York called my attention to the fact. We are anxious to have the business institutions of this country know that we want to do something for their assistance. At the same time we want them to know that there is a responsibility upon them, that it is our business and our duty to locate, that it is our duty to find out, what is going on, and that the people of this country have the right to know about the business affairs of the country which bear upon the general welfare and necessities of our people, and whether or not, on the whole, they are being carried on for the interests of the whole country. That is our business as legislators to properly provide for, as we have done in this legislation. More and more business concerns are being impressed with a public use and thus come under public scrutiny. Business men must realize that fact and prepare for it. They may not like it, but such a theory is progressive and will be made effective in legislation and adjudication. Then business men and those interested in so-called private corporations must realize this fact and that it will be increasingly the basis of much legislation and public administration in the future. The Supreme Court of the United States and other courts have often laid down the rule that all corporations are created and are allowed to exist and do business primarily for the benefit of the public, and that the profit of the corporators must be secondary. A corporation receives a portion of the public sovereignty for its creation and immunity and privilege. Without such grant of sovereignty it could not exist or move or have any being. This is presumed to be first for the public welfare, as it is and must be; so that it is our duty, in a bill like this, to properly provide for such machinery as will insure the public having its just rights and privileges. This is not with any hostility to corporations, but with a sincere desire to have them properly fulfill the functions of their being, by which they live and flourish.

There is a fear that we have impaired individual initiative and individual rights. We have done the best we could not to infringe upon the provisions of the Constitution of the United States protecting individual rights to our citizens, and especially the provisions of this bill do not interfere with the personal initiative of the citizen.

We realize that the great progress of this country has come from the wonderful personal initiative of the American citizen, and we want that force continued, to increasingly grow, for the general welfare of the people, as well as for the welfare of the individual himself. We realize it has developed our industries, our resources, our people, and made our Nation the wonder of history. We wish to preserve this splendid power which has made the United States what it is. At the same time we want these men who have accomplished so much and are capable of so much to realize that there is a responsibility upon them as American citizens, that they receive a part of the blessings of our institutions, and that they must yield something and do something for the common welfare and not try to grab it all for themselves. It is with that view that we Republicans have approached the consideration of this measure. I believe it has been the right thing to do. We have done it as Representatives of the people of the United States, desirous of assisting in a genuinely constructive measure which should be the basis for the blessings of an industrial, economic, social, and political freedom, advancement, and prosperity for generations to come. [Applause.]

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HULL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an Interstate Trade Commission, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR TO-NIGHT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. MOON, to preside as Speaker pro tempore for to-night.

RECESS.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, is it necessary to make a motion to recess under the rule?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, before the Speaker rules on that, I think I should say that the Committee on Rules deliberately fixed the rule so that the House should take the recess without a motion, and I think the rule is mandatory on the House, just as it is on the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to believe that is so under the rule, and, in accordance with the resolution, the House will stand in recess until 8 o'clock to-night.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House, at 8 o'clock p. m., resumed its session and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. MOON].

INTERSTATE TRADE COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule adopted to-day the House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bills referred to in the rule, the particular bill under consideration being H. R. 15613, to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15613, with Mr. HULL in the chair.

Mr. ADAMSON. I would like the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] to proceed if he is so disposed.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, as some of you know, I am somewhat of an enthusiast in favor of the creation of a Federal trade commission. I have the honor of having introduced into this House the first bill to create a Federal commission with jurisdiction and power over our industrial corporations. That bill was introduced on the 25th of January, 1912. Even in the campaign of 1910 I said in many of my speeches that such a commission should be created. I spent a very considerable time in study and investigation in the preparation of that bill. The number of it is House bill 18711, and it was introduced in the Sixty-second Congress. The bill covers the entire subject, giving the commission very extensive power and jurisdiction.

On the 20th of February, 1912, I delivered in this House a carefully prepared speech giving an outline of the provisions of the bill and strongly urging the necessity of such a commission. So far as I have been able to ascertain, that was the first speech delivered in the House of Representatives advocating the creation of a Federal trade commission. This was before any political party had indorsed the proposition. Since that time the Republican and Progressive Parties have specifically indorsed the proposition in platform declarations, and President Wilson, a Democratic President, has by special message recommended the creation of such a commission. I naturally take some pride in the fact that a measure which I was the first to initiate in this House and which I was the first to openly advocate on the floor of this House has now received the approval of the three great political parties and will no doubt soon be crystallized into law. I expect to vote for this bill. My criticism of the bill is not for what it does contain, but for what it does not contain. In other words, the bill does not give the commission sufficient power to make it a regulative body that will accomplish the best results. In 1912, when the Republican convention met at Chicago, it declared in favor of creating a Federal trade commission. This bill does not go so far as the Republican platform would justify, but I am glad that the Republican Party was the first to declare in favor of a Federal trade commission. But I want to congratulate the Democratic Party on adopting this measure, on assuming the responsibility of its enactment into law; and whether we give this commission at this time extensive power and jurisdiction or not, this measure, in my judgment, will be a landmark in the history of national legislation, and as long as your party shall endure you will refer to the creation of this Federal trade commission as one of the masterpieces of legislation for which your party is entitled to credit. [Applause.]

The Republican platform uses language something like this:

> In the enforcement and administration of Federal laws governing interstate commerce and enterprises impressed with a public use engaged therein there is much that may be committed to a Federal trade commission, thus placing in the hands of an administrative board many of the functions now necessarily exercised by the courts.

That platform does not say there is a little that may be committed to a Federal trade commission. It does not say that there are some things that may be committed to a trade commission, but it says there is "much" that may be committed to a trade commission. The platform further says, "thus placing in the hands of that commission many of the functions now exercised by the courts." The platform says "many functions," not a few functions, but many functions. I have the very highest respect and regard for the Republican members of the Interstate Commerce Committee. I recognize and admire their ability. In no way do I wish to reflect upon their work. But I submit that the power and jurisdiction given the trade commission in this bill is not such as is demanded in the language of the Republican platform.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. My colleague must remember the Republican members on that committee were decidedly in the minority. We were not framing the bill.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. That point is well taken, and I, of course, feel sure that if the Republican members had been the majority of that committee and had the responsibility of framing this legislation that the commission would have been given much additional power.

A FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

I have prepared a summary of the uses to which a Federal trade commission may be put and the things for which such a commission is needed. This summary is as follows:

1. To aid the courts in the dissolution, disintegration, and reorganization of unlawful corporations.
2. To aid in the enforcement of antitrust laws.
3. To do the work of investigation, recommendation, and publicity now assigned to the Bureau of Corporations.
4. To aid without legal proceedings, but with legal authority, through conference, negotiation, and mediation, in the readjustment of business in harmony with the law.
5. To control the practices and business methods of large industrial corporations.
6. To reenforce, restore, and maintain competition as the chief price regulator, and, if necessary for the public welfare, to exercise a limited direct control over prices.
7. To minimize the power of the large industrial corporation to concentrate wealth, and to maximize its power as an agency for the equitable distribution of wealth.
8. To enable us to secure all the benefits and advantages of the large industrial unit and escape the evils and dangers thereof.
9. To relieve doubt and uncertainty in business, develop trade, encourage commerce, and promote enterprise.
10. To secure labor the highest wage, the largest amount of employment under the most favorable conditions and circumstances.
11. To allay public suspicion and distrust, remove prejudice, and secure the people from unjust tribute levied by monopolistic corporations.
12. To promote industrial peace and thereby contribute to social justice, industrial strength, commercial power, and business prosperity.

Now, I believe that the time has come when the Federal Government should exercise very great control over our large industrial corporations. I listened this afternoon with a great deal of interest and pleasure and with much profit to the speech made by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON] and to the speech made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], and yet I could not help but feel that they were too conservative, if you will allow that term; that they were not moving up to what the country expected; that they were inclined to postpone and delay and put off any effective action. Now, what is the fact? Nearly 24 years ago the Sherman antitrust law was enacted. What law since that time has been placed upon the statute books that gives to the Federal Government any additional power to control or regulate the practices of our great industrial corporations? Not one. What has been done by Congress in these 24 years to curb the trusts? Nothing. I believe that our courts and our Attorneys General through the various administrations have done the best they could. During all these years concentration has been going on. Our corporations have become larger, our industrial units have become greater. It is true that under the decisions rendered by our Supreme Court some of our largest corporations have been dissolved, but the units into which they have been dissolved are still exceedingly large corporations. Take the American Tobacco Co. One of them has, I think, $97,000,000 of capital and another $67,000,000, and so on. The United States Steel Corporation has $1,400,000,000 of capital. And so we have these great business combinations. Great capital, extensive organization, a large business are not necessarily objectionable. We must have large business concerns to meet commercial conditions. We can not stand still. We must grow; we must look for expansion in the future; we must expect and desire that our business interests shall continue to grow at home and expand abroad; we must have large industrial units to meet and compete with the great business organizations of other countries who are competing with us in our own country and in the markets of the world. So I submit that the chances are that in the future our business organizations must continue large.

Now, I claim, however, that these large business concerns necessarily possess large monopolistic power. I do not believe, with two or three great corporations having capital and wealth beyond the comprehension of man, with their immense business organization extending out into every State and district and county in the Union, that competition between those concerns means effective competition. And so, according to my theory, it is necessary when the business concern is large to throw around that business power of the Federal Government or else that concern will have large monopolistic power. And I mean by that monopolistic power that it will possess the power which will enable it, in a large degree, to arbitrarily control the prices of its products. So I believe, for the protection of the people, it is necessary that we should have some kind of governmental control that will regulate the practices and business methods of our large industrial concerns. So I am disappointed in this bill that it does not give the commission adequate power. While I earnestly urge that the commission be given largely increased power, I still believe that the commission should be created even if it only has the power as given in this bill, namely, to secure proper reports, annual and otherwise; to assist in the dissolution of corporations; to investigate the violations of the law in specific cases; and the power to follow up the work of the courts and see that these corporations, when dissolved, shall live up to the decree of the courts. All this will be useful and helpful, and I will be glad to see it done.

WEALTH OF OUR CORPORATIONS.

Mr. Chairman, Government reports show that our corporations have $92,000,000,000 in stocks and bonds. If the great corporations own $92,000,000,000 worth of stocks and bonds, that must represent half the wealth of this country. The report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shows that these corporations upon that $92,000,000,000 have a net profit of nearly 4 per cent annually. So that a large amount of wealth is in the hands of corporations, and it is centered in large corporations, with the wonderful power of drawing something from every home in the land.

The instrumentalities used in commerce and trade have changed, but our laws have not changed. Interstate business is largely under control of the gigantic business concerns—great corporations—mammoth industrial organizations, wielding incomprehensible power in the business and commercial world. This power under proper control may be used for the glory of our country, or unrestrained it may be used for the exploitation of the public and oppression of the people.

Few people realize to what extent the corporations control the business of this country. Few persons fully comprehend how these great corporations now touch every avenue of trade, commerce, and business, receive tribute from every avocation, calling, and profession of life, and draw support and sustenance from every home and fireside in the land.

The corporations of the country, after deducting all the cost of labor, material, losses, and every other expense, made an annual net profit of $3,213,247,000. Industrial and manufacturing corporations alone make an annual net profit of $1,309,819,000. They employ 7,000,000 persons, and their annual products are worth $21,000,000,000. The corporations of the country, by a conservative estimate, own one-half of the wealth of the Nation. Probably not one-tenth of the people own any interest in these corporations. The corporation is a great business invention which has aided steam and electricity as mighty forces in the production of wealth and in the extension of commerce.

The great problem now before us is to make these corporations better instruments for the equitable distribution of wealth. We have emphasized the problem of producing wealth. The time has come to give greater attention to its proper, fair, and equitable distribution among the great masses of our producers and consumers.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Would you have the commission given power to regulate the affairs of all corporations?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I would not, because I believe it is only large corporations that possess monopolistic power.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. At what place would you give them that right—as to the amount of their capital stock or the amount of business done? How would you describe "big business," as you call it?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. In the bill which I prepared I fixed the limit at concerns which do an annual business to the value of $5,000,000. I place it upon the amount of business transacted and not on their capital stock.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. So that the corporation that did a business of $4,500,000 would not be controlled, and the one that did a business of $5,500,000 would be under the control of the Government?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. If my bill becomes a law, only the large concerns would be subject to its provisions. I would have no objection to amending it so as to bring in a larger number. But I think it would be unwise to undertake to strictly control small concerns. Monopoly is the evil we wish to control. Competition is the thing we wish to maintain. In the realm of small business, when competition is abundant, there is no demand for Federal control. These may be left to State control.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I will yield.

Mr. WILLIS. Does not the gentleman admit, then, that this bill, in one respect at least, goes further than his bill? He understands, according to the terms of this bill, by the power of classification, the Interstate Trade Commission will have the authority to regulate and control to some extent the business of a corporation without regard to the capital stock.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I doubt the propriety of the commission to do that, although there are some reasons for it, I recognize.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. The gentleman is making a very instructive argument, and I would like to inquire of him whether he can tell us how many corporations there are in the United States with a capital stock of $5,000,000 and over?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I will say to the gentleman that there are something like 268,000 corporations, I believe, in the United States, according to the report made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. My idea was, as I figured it out, that, measured by their products of $5,000,000, there would be something like 300 corporations placed under my bill. I think the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON] estimated that there would be something like 1,300 corporations brought under the supervision of the commission by this bill and required to make reports.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I will yield to my colleague from Indiana.

Mr. PETERSON. Does the gentleman approve the proposition of classifying——

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen use such soft tones in their conversation that we can not hear them. We know that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] can readily be heard with his resonant voice, but we can not hear the other gentlemen. I would like to be able to hear them.

Mr. PETERSON. We have such a modest audience that we thought they ought to be able to hear our modest voices.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PETERSON. I want to know if the gentleman approved the classification that is made in this bill of two classes—one of $5,000,000 and the other less?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I see no serious objection to that provision.

Mr. PETERSON. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that at the time of the supposed dissolution of the Standard Oil Co. its capitalization was $1,000,000, and that immediately upon the reorganization of one of its subsidiary companies it reorganized with a capitalization of $30,000,000, and in two years paid a dividend of 750 per cent on $30,000,000?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I was not aware of that.

Mr. PETERSON. In view of that, would you not say it would be more advisable to fix the classification upon the assets of the corporation than on the capitalization?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. My idea is that it would be better to fix it upon the output, and perhaps the capitalization—both combined.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Is it not true that at the time the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PETERSON] speaks the surplus of the Standard Oil Co. was very large?

Mr. PETERSON. It certainly was.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman is aware of the fact that this classification would not prevent an investigation, whether the corporation was capitalized at less than $5,000,000 or over? The commission can make an investigation of corporations of less than $5,000,000 as well as those with more than $5,000,000?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I believe so. I wanted to give an idea of the way and manner in which we should undertake to control the practices of corporations. Now, it is evidently proper to prohibit a few acts that are well known to be improper. We can make a few prohibitions, but you will never control the large concerns of this country by a few prohibitions, by prohibiting one or two or three or four or five things. In some way you must enact a general law that will include classes of acts which are improper. I have attempted to do this in my bill, and I want to present these provisions in my bill.

FAIR, JUST, AND REASONABLE PRACTICES.

The Federal Government long ago entered upon the policy of controlling the practices of industrial corporations engaged in interstate business. The Sherman antitrust law controls the practices of such corporations. That law forbids the doing of certain things. When we prohibit corporations from doing certain things we thereby assume the right to control the practices and methods of such corporations. So far, however, the law only prohibits certain acts. We have not fixed any standard by which the business methods of such corporations shall be judged. There are those who seem to think that we should confine our legislation to statutory provisions prohibiting industrial corporations from doing this or that thing. It is well enough to prohibit certain acts—to make certain things unlawful—but we should do more than this. We should by law promulgate a rule of business morality, create a standard by which the methods and practices of industrial corporations shall be judged. I have attempted to do this in section 4 of House bill 1890. This section is as follows:

SEC. 4. That every practice, method, means, system, policy, device, scheme, or contrivance used by any corporation subject to the provisions of this act in conducting its business, or in the management, control, regulation, promotion, or extension thereof, shall be just, fair, and reasonable and not contrary to public policy or dangerous to the public welfare, and every corporation subject to the provisions of this act in the conduct of its business is hereby prohibited from engaging in any practice, or from using any means, method, or system, or from pursuing any policy, or from resorting to any device, scheme, or contrivance whatsoever that is unjust, unfair, or unreasonable, or that is contrary to public policy or dangerous to the public welfare, and every act or thing in this section prohibited is hereby declared to be unlawful.

These great business corporations should not be permitted in conducting their business to engage in practices, use methods, or resort to devices that are not just, fair, and reasonable. Big business should have a high standard of business ethics. Whether corporations have souls or not, they should be compelled, in the management of their business and in all means, methods, schemes, devices, and contrivances used for the enlargement and extension of such business to keep clearly within the bounds of the principles of sound morality. While I believe the business of this country is, in general, conducted along lines of high moral principles, Congress might well promulgate a new code of business ethics for the guidance of the managers of the great industrial corporations.

JUST AND FAIR TREATMENT TO THE PUBLIC AND COMPETITORS.

Section 5 of House bill 1890 supplements section 3 in fixing a standard for our industrial corporations to follow in dealing with the public. Think of it. At the present time there is no law except the Sherman Antitrust Act which in any way limits, restricts, regulates, or controls the business methods of industrial corporations. So long as they do not violate some general criminal statute or the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law, corporations may resort to all kinds of acts and practices which are unfair to competitors and inimical to the public. They may, with perfect impunity, treat competitors unfairly and discriminate against localities, and be guilty of all kinds of business immorality. And we are talking about big business—about corporations with immense capital—having a large degree of monopolistic power. Why not enact a statute which will crystallize the sentiment, the judgment, and the conscience of a nation into a rule of action for the guidance of these great business concerns in dealing with competitors and the public? This I have attempted to do in section 5 of my bill, which is as follows:

SEC. 5. That every corporation subject to the provisions of this act shall deal justly and fairly with competitors and the public, and it shall be unlawful for any such corporation to grant to any person or persons any special privilege or advantage which shall be unjust and unfair to others, or unjustly and unreasonably discriminatory against others, or to enter into any special contract, agreement, or arrangement with any person or persons which shall be unjustly and unreasonably discriminatory against others, or which shall give to such person or persons an unfair and unjust advantage over others, or that shall give to the people of any locality or section of the country any unfair, unjust, or unreasonable advantage over the people of any other locality or section of the country, or that shall be contrary to public policy or dangerous to the public welfare, and any and all the acts or things in this section declared to be unlawful are hereby prohibited.

This section is modeled after sections 2 and 3 of the act of February 4, 1887, entitled "An act to regulate commerce" (24 Stat. L., 379). The two sections are as follows:

SEC. 2. That if any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall, directly or indirectly, by any special rate, rebate, drawback, or other device, charge, demand, collect, or receive from any person or persons a greater or less compensation for any service rendered, or to be rendered, in the transportation of passengers or property, subject to the provisions of this act, than it charges, demands, collects, or receives from any other person or persons for doing for him or them a like and contemporaneous service in the transportation of a like kind of traffic under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, such common carrier shall be deemed guilty of unjust discrimination, which is hereby prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, in any respect whatsoever, or to subject any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever.

Every common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall, according to their respective powers, afford all reasonable, proper, and equal facilities for the interchange of traffic between their respective lines, and for the receiving, forwarding, and delivering of passengers and property to and from their several lines and those connecting therewith, and shall not discriminate in their rates and charges between such connecting lines.

These provisions in the "act to regulate commerce," with supplemental legislation along the same line, have resulted in driving from the railway transportation business by far the greater part of the practices and methods of railway corporations, about which for a long time there was so much just complaint. There is now little complaint of unfair discrimination as between individuals or sections of the country.

In other words, the provisions in the act creating the Interstate Commerce Commission, which I have quoted, under the administration of the Interstate Commerce Commission, have resulted in the main in giving to the public just and reasonable rates, to individuals and localities equality of charges, and to all impartial privileges and facilities.

May we not fairly conclude that by promulgating similar fundamental rules of action for the guidance of our mammoth industrial corporations, and by creating a like commission to administer and enforce these rules of action, we may expect equally good results upon the methods and practices of our great industrial institutions?

POWER OF COMMISSION TO MAKE REGULATIONS.

One paragraph in section 9 of House bill 1890 is as follows:

The commission is hereby authorized and empowered to make and establish rules and regulations not in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States to aid in the administration and enforcement of the provisions of this act, and may, by such rules and regulations, prohibit any particular or specific act or acts, practice, method, system, policy, device, scheme, or contrivance that is contrary to any of the provisions of this act.

Under this provision of the bill the commission not only has power to make rules and regulations to aid in administering and enforcing the provisions of the bill, but may by such rules and regulations prohibit any particular or specific act, practice, method, system, policy, device, scheme, or contrivance which is contrary to any of the provisions of the act.

It will be well for Congress to prohibit any known act or practice hitherto indulged in by corporations, by which the public has suffered, but it is safe to say Congress will cover by enactment only conspicuous abuses. The commission should therefore have power to prohibit by rule things which are contrary to the general rules enunciated by the law. Congress acts with deliberation. It takes time to enact laws. The commission can act quickly. Besides, the corporations may adopt new practices which are offensive. If they are contrary to the broad rules of action, enunciated by the law, the commission may quickly make a rule that will make the practice unlawful.

This is the plan adopted in creating the Interstate Commerce Commission. You may talk about giving this commission power, and you may say there is little power given to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Yet when we created the Interstate Commerce Commission we did declare that the practices and charges of the railroad company should be reasonable. We did declare against discriminations. We did make general rules that should control our transportation corporations thereafter.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. My time is nearly up, but I will yield.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will yield as much time to the gentleman as I take up.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I shall be glad to yield

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman is aware of the fact that our purpose in the preparation of this bill was to establish an instrumentality, leaving the Congress to enact in the future as many general laws as the wisdom of Congress might dictate. There may be many or there may be few, but such a law as the gentleman suggests or any others may be enacted to be administered through this instrumentality when it is established. Many of them are now pending before our committee. Among them is one to establish a general antifraud law, patterned after the British honest-tradesmen law. That will apply to all frauds practiced in interstate commerce in any line of business. We propose that as one of the laws that should be enacted after this commission bill should be passed. Now, I will ask the gentleman if those suggestions will not help to forward his idea?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I think so, and I have not any doubt but what from time to time those things will come and will give the commission additional power; but I think we ought to begin in advance of where you are beginning.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will say that it is not a question of power vested in the commission by this bill. We are establishing it and clothing it with power. It is a different thing from considering what general laws we may enact to be administered. We shall consider those other things apart from the establishment of this commission as an institution and instrumentality.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I understand very well; but, as I understand it, the success that has followed the administration of the law which brought the Interstate Commerce Commission into existence has not come by our enactments, except in so far as those enactments have given additional power to that commission.

Mr. ADAMSON. Now, if the gentleman will pardon me, as he has made that analogy, let him follow it. That commission was instituted as an incident to the act to regulate commerce. The law to regulate commerce was first drawn without any proposition in it for a commission. The commission was put in as an incident to it. Then the commission having been established at the same time that the first interstate-commerce act was passed, we have followed that up by the enactment of many laws since that time, and every few years we revise the act to regulate commerce; but it is something distinct from the commission itself. The commission has been instituted, and Congress passes the laws which are enforced by the commission.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. But here is what you did: In that very act Congress declared general powers and control over the charges and practices of railroad corporations. They said, even in the first act, that if any individual, municipality, or certain public officers of a State made complaint before that commission the offending corporation should be notified and have a hearing, and the commission would then make an order; and thus it became a real, regulative force and power; and it was not so much the law as it was the fact that this great commission had the power to summon the offending railroads before it and give those railroads their orders.

Mr. ADAMSON. And every time in the future when Congress enacts a general law pertinent for this Interstate Trade Commission to administer, that fact will be noted in the law, and the Interstate Trade Commission will be authorized to proceed to execute that act, just as in this case it is authorized to look into existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. I want to yield to the gentleman three minutes, to make up for the time which I occupied in the interruption.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Just one more point. I believe that the Attorneys General of previous administrations have exercised, and that the present Attorney General is now exercising, a power and control over the business interests of this country that the Executive ought not to exercise. I believe it is unsafe for an administration in power, an administrative officer representing a great political party, to hold the power of life and death over the great business interests of this country. And instead of giving additional power to the Attorney General we should, as the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON] said this afternoon, create a great, independent, nonpartisan commission, independent of the President, independent of Cabinet officers, removed so far as possible from partisan politics, that would command the respect and confidence of all parties and of all the people of the Nation. It never was intended that the Attorney General should have great business concerns come to his office and negotiate from time to time upon what conditions they shall do business. The committee, in their report on this bill, quote from what Attorney General Harmon said, I believe in 1896, in substance that he believed the proper course for the Attorney General is to work in the courts, that the Attorney General should not be an investigating committee, that such work ought to be left to an independent source; and yet we are multiplying our laws, we are adding additional statutes, we are prohibiting this and that, thus throwing upon the Attorney General more work, more power over business, offering greater temptation to use this power in aid of a political administration. What I say is not particularly applicable to the present Attorney General or the administration in power. Whatever we do in regulating business should be removed as far as possible from political influence.

It will be far safer to place this power in the hands of a great independent commission that will go on while administrations may change. That is one reason why I believe in having all these matters placed, so far as they can be, in the hands of a commission, taking these business matters out of politics. I believe that the great masses of the business interests of this country are in favor, not of a commision to investigate, but of a trade commission with power to give orders, with power to advise, with power to confer, with power to mediate, with power to direct the honest business interests of this country along the right pathway. I believe the hearings before the committee showed that to be what business men want and what consumers and producers want. I certainly should regret to have any vote that I cast here injure the business interests of this country; but I believe that legislation along this line is for business peace. I believe it will contribute to business prosperity; I believe that it will be for the benefit of the whole country. [Applause.]

WEALTH AND POWER OF CORPORATIONS.

In closing let me say that many of our industrial corporations are, in fact, though not in the eye of the law, public agencies, institutions that are impressed with a public use, and are in truth and in reality quasi-public corporations. We must in some way make a distinction between the gigantic corporations possessing large monopolistic power, and controlling the manufacture, sale, and distribution of the necessities of life, and the great majority of the smaller corporations which possess little, if any, monopolistic power, and which are in no way in a position to impose any great burdens upon the people through excessive prices. Out of nearly 300,000 industrial corporations in the United States perhaps 300 to 500 would cover all the industrial corporations which really possess such monopolistic power as to be able to injure any great part of the public through the possession of monopolistic powers. Let us separate the sheep from the goats. Let free competition, untrammeled by governmental control, reign among our lamblike industrial corporations, but let us bring all other corporations under the yoke of governmental control.

The great corporations largely control the productive forces of our country. The wealth produced naturally flows into the corporations. As I have already pointed out, measured by the stocks and bonds they have issued, our corporations own $92,000,000,000 of our national wealth. This is more than double the $41,000,000,000 at which all our farms and farm property is valued. Seventy-two billion dollars of wealth is owned by two classes of our corporations—that is, transportation and communication corporations and manufacturing corporations.

The census of 1910 shows that one-third of our manufacturing establishments employ 90 per cent of the 7,000,000 wage earners in these establishments and produce 95 per cent of all our manufactured products. In round numbers, 10 per cent of our manufacturing establishments employ three-fourths of the labor in such establishments and produce four-fifths of the product.

One per cent of our manufacturing establishments employ one-third of the labor, and produce nearly one-half of our manufactured products.

I do not believe in Government control of private business. I do not believe that would ever be necessary. All progress would cease if we should destroy the incentive for individual initiation, for individual effort and energy. But corporations are artificial persons. When they attain a certain size, and acquire large control over the production of a product in common use, they cease to be strictly private concerns. They have become impressed with the public use, they have become public agencies and quasi-public corporations, and as such should be placed under the supervision and control of our Federal Government.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], I will yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from California [Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND] is recognized for such time as he may desire.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, after the very able presentation of the provisions of this bill this afternoon by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], my colleagues on the subcommittee which framed this bill, I do not feel that I should consume much time this evening in a discussion of the merits of the measure. I happen to be the only member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce who is not of the legal profession, and I might say that that accounts, of course, for the even-balanced legislation which so frequently emanates from that committee. [Laughter.]

I shall support this bill. It is perhaps the first recommendation of President Wilson during this session of Congress that I have been able to support. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I support it also because it is in conformity with, as has already been stated, a plank in the Republican national platform, and I might add parenthetically that we Republicans believe that our party declarations "are not molasses to catch flies," and always endeavor to live up to our party platforms. We do not seek excuses for repudiating party planks. I do not go quite so far as the illustrious Secretary of State, who declares that a man who violates the party platform is a criminal, but I do contend, like the Speaker of this House, that a party platform means something.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] this afternoon made reference to the trade-commission plank of the Republican platform of 1912, but he did not read it. In view of the fact that reference has also been made to it this evening, I think it might be well for me to read it into the RECORD:

> In the enforcement and administration of Federal laws governing interstate commerce and enterprises impressed with a public use engaged therein there is much that may be committed to a Federal trade commission, thus placing in the hands of an administrative board many of the functions now necessarily exercised by the courts. This will promote promptness in the administration of the laws, and avoid delays and technicalities incident to court procedure.

A reading of this declaration discloses that the pending bill does not go quite as far as the plank in the Republican national platform, but it is in harmony with the spirit of that plank, and being in harmony with the spirit of the plank, as a Republican, I certainly feel bound to support the bill now before us.

The Democratic Party has announced a very ambitious program along the line of antitrust legislation. I do not pose as a prophet, but I want to make the prediction that this will be the only bill of the group that will become a law during the present session of Congress. Well-posted Democrats believe this, although they can not so publicly state. The others will probably pass the House, but will never be acted upon by the Senate. If this be true, and only the pending bill becomes a law, as I have predicted, in my judgment we will have a measure that will be welcomed, not only by the people generally, but will meet with the approval of every honest business man throughout the United States, and I speak from the standpoint of a business man. The other bills contain much of merit but need amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. I will.

Mr. ADAMSON. I wish to congratulate the country on the prospect of the gentleman from California coming to the Senate and improving the expedition of that dignified body in the near future. [Applause.]

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. I thank the distinguished Democrat, the gentleman from Georgia, for that kind reference and indorsement, for it may prove very serviceable in the coming campaign. [Laughter.]

One of the best provisions in this bill is that providing for publicity. Many of us realize the fact that in many instances business concerns resort to certain doubtful practices because followed by their competitors, but if they knew that these practices had to be reported to a commission, and that the commission had the power to give the facts to the public, it would prove a very potent deterrent.

It is true, as already stated, we had before our committee numerous witnesses, many of whose names are known throughout the length and breadth of the country—the Hon. Seth Low; Herbert Knox Smith, former Commissioner of Corporations; the president of the University of Wisconsin, Dr. Van Hise; and others whose names are as familiar to the people of this country. They practically all favored a measure along these lines. Some would go further than the committee saw fit to go, and others would not go quite as far. But, in my judgment, this conservative measure can not be objected to by anyone who conducts an honest business. It is not so radical as to disturb business conditions, which everyone realizes are far from satisfactory throughout the country.

Our Democratic friends are boasting of their achievements since they assumed control of every branch of the Government. They boast particularly of having forced through their tariff bill, in whose wake they promised would come prosperity and reduced cost of living. No one can be found who has located that prosperity, and every housewife in the Nation knows that the cost of living has been soaring under this beneficent Democratic tariff.

Briefly, the bill provides for the appointment of an interstate trade commission, to be composed of three commissioners to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. Not more than two of the commissioners shall be members of the same political party. The commissioners shall receive a salary of $10,000 a year. Upon the organization of the commission all existing powers, authority, and duties of the Bureau of Corporations and of the Commissioner of Corporations are to be vested in the commission. When directed by the President, the several departments and bureaus of the Government shall furnish the commission, upon its request, all records, papers, and information in their possession relating to any corporation, subject to any of the provisions of the act.

It appears that in time past there have been jealousies in various departments and bureaus, and at times it was difficult to obtain information from one department of great value to another in work of investigation.

Under the further provisions of the bill every corporation engaged in commerce, excepting corporations subject to the acts to regulate commerce, which, by itself or with one or more other corporations owned, operated, controlled, or organized in conjunction with it so as to constitute substantially a business unit, has a capital of not less than $5,000,000, or, having a less capital, belongs to a class of corporations which the commission may designate, shall furnish annually to the commission such information, statements, and records of its organization, bondholders, stockholders, and financial condition, and also such information, statements, and records of its relation to other corporations, and its business and practices while engaged in commerce as the commission shall require. The commission may also prescribe a uniform system of annual reports, containing all the required information and statistics for the period of 12 months ending with the fiscal year of each corporation's report, and they shall be made out under oath or otherwise and filed with the commission at its office at Washington within three months after the close of the year for which the report is made, unless additional time be granted. The commission may also require such special reports as it may deem advisable.

Penalties are provided for failure to file said annual reports. A fine of $100 for each and every day that the corporation shall be in default is provided.

Facts relating to any alleged violations of the antitrust laws by any corporation shall be investigated by the commission upon the direction of the President, the Attorney General, or either House of Congress.

The commission in its report may include recommendations for readjustment of business in order that the corporation investigated may thereafter conduct its business in accordance with law. Reports made after investigation under this particular section may be made public in the discretion of the commission.

It was anticipated that in the course of investigations made by this commission information might be obtained concerning certain unfair competition or practices not necessarily constituting a violation of existing law, and that when such practices were disclosed report shall be made to the President to aid him in recommendations to Congress for legislation.

Any person under the act who willfully makes a false entry or statement in any report submitted shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction subject to a fine of not more than $5,000 or to imprisonment for not more than three years, or both fine and imprisonment.

Annual report shall be made to Congress by the commission, which will furnish facts and statistics of value in the determination of questions connected with the conduct of commerce of corporations. The reports shall also include recommendations as to additional legislation deemed necessary.

Provision is made for the safeguarding of all trade secrets and private lists of customers.

These in brief are the provisions of the pending bill. Personally I believe this bill should be passed and the law accorded a fair trial and that it will work out satisfactorily. It is far better to enact a measure of this kind, conservatively drafted, than to attempt more radical legislation.

Those of us who have been Members of this body for a number of years know that the interstate-commerce law is an evolution. It began with a basis such as we have in the pending bill, and as it was tried out and the necessities arose the commission came to Congress and additional powers were asked for, and Congress responded in nearly every instance. This bill will furnish a basis. If it is found not to be sufficiently comprehensive, if it needs to be made more drastic, the commission can come to Congress and ask for legislation, and I have always found in my experience here that this body is responsive to any legitimate request from any bureau or department of this Government. I hope that the Republican side of the House will support the measure. Let us give it a fair trial. If it is found that we should go further and enact legislation more in line with the Republican platform, it will not be unlikely that we as Republicans will then be in a better position to formulate such legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Has the gentleman from Minnesota any speaker that he can yield to at the present time?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; but I thought the gentleman from Georgia was to yield to some one.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am considerably ahead in time so far. If the gentleman has no other speaker, there is one that we own jointly, who is to divide his time between the two sides.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Perhaps our colleague from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] should be recognized. I yield the gentleman 15 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. If he is ready, I think he ought to go ahead; and I yield him 15 minutes, so he must treat the two sides fairly. [Laughter.]

[Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Hampshire has expired.

Mr. FESS. I hope the gentleman from Minnesota will give the gentleman from New Hampshire a little more time.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I can not. My time is all promised. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HINEBAUGH].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HINEBAUGH] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I think possibly I ought to say that I shall probably vote for all three of these bills [applause], although I sincerely hope that at least two of them will be amended.

Mr. Chairman, three great problems confronted the Democratic administration when it rubbed its eyes after a profound sleep of 16 years and awoke to the startling fact that somehow and through some kind of ledgerdemain, it had been intrusted with power, and correspondingly burdened with responsibility. The effect was not unlike that which amazed and dumfounded Rip Van Winkle when he awoke from his long sleep. The Democratic Party had served a useful purpose as a party of opposition for a good many years, but they had threatened to shoot for such a long, long time that when the actual command was given to fire it is not at all surprising that they missed the mark at which they had been aiming since the days of Grover Cleveland.

Please do not misunderstand me, gentlemen. I do not mean to say that the Democrats are not full of good intentions, for that they certainly are; but you know Shakespeare tells us that hades is completely paved with the same thing. But be that as it may, we must admit that under the able leadership of President Wilson and the courteous, broad-minded gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], they went at their job tooth and toe nails. They were so anxious to swat the robber tariff of the standpat Republicans that they locked the doors of the Democratic caucus room so tight that even a Progressive Member of the House could not peep in and see what they were doing, much less were we allowed to give any advice, notwithstanding the well-known fact that we represent the second party in numerical strength and importance in the Nation. And right at this point, Mr. Chairman, the Democrats fell down. For had they invited the Progressives into their caucus and listened to our counsels, the Republican calamity howlers and the Democratic prosperity shouters would not now be straining their vocal cords and bursting their lungs to tell the country what it already knows much better than they possibly can know, while the Sergeant at Arms continues to hand them their pay checks.

In spite of all this, our little band of Progressives has enjoyed many a drowsy, sleepy hour while you have been at this job, as though your political lives were about to be demanded by the people, evidently not knowing that the day has gone by when you can fool the people with the tariff as a political issue. The people intend to remove the tariff from politics in 1916 and make it what every honest man knows it always has been—a purely local, economic, business question. They intend to do this by entrusting the Progressive Party with power to do the things for which it stands and in which a large majority of the people believe. When that glad time comes, and come it surely will, there will be no more wholesale tinkering with the tariff. A scientific expert tariff commission, with full and complete information, will handle the tariff, item by item, as conditions warrant, and business will no longer be disturbed by a long period of waiting and uncertainty.

The Democratic Party, after gumming up the tariff machinery of the country with a too liberal application of their revenue tariff oil, applied at random and without intelligent consideration as to just what parts of the tariff machine needed their kind of oil; after doing all that by main force, they plunged recklessly into the field of banking and currency reform. The Republican Party, after its palsied efforts at currency legislation, is now estopped from making any noise about the Democratic policy and could only say in sorrowful accents, "You are stealing our Aldrich plan." It must be admitted, however, that some of their progressively inclined members voted right, after the Progressives in the House had assisted the Democrats in framing a fairly good law. If the Democratic majority had been wise enough to accept half the suggestions and amendments offered by the Progressives the result would have been much better and the question finally settled for many years to come. But here, again, Mr. Speaker, the Democrats apparently refused to be guided by the Progressives, although they are indebted to us for their fleeting tenure of office, and for a second time during their administration dashed from their lips the cup of future success.

And now the Democratic Party enters upon the consideration of the third, last, and most important of the three gigantic issues with which they had to deal, namely, the trusts. [Applause.] How do they approach this great question? In their Baltimore platform they said:

> A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable.

Just here I wish to remind the Democratic Party that Mr. Taft in 1909 said:

> The woolen and cotton schedules in the Republican tariff bill are indefensible and intolerable.

Yet he subsequently signed the Aldrich tariff bill, and still later attempted to defend it. Beware, my Democratic brethren, or history will repeat itself. In your Baltimore platform you also said:

> We demand the enactment of such legislation as may be deemed necessary to make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist in the United States.

Is your program of antitrust legislation so far-reaching?

What else did you say? You said:

> We condemn the action of the Republican administration in compromising with the Standard Oil and the Tobacco Trusts.

Again I say, beware, or your Attorney General will compromise you with his reorganization agreements as a cure-all for the wrongs which you have pledged the people to right.

It does not, however, lie in the mouth of any Republican to criticize the Democratic program on trust legislation. With your hats off, clothed in sackcloth and ashes, you Republicans should approach this subject keeping step to the funeral march of lost opportunity, and with bowed heads and contrite hearts you should repeat in low and mournful tones the words of that sad, yet beautiful, poem entitled "Opportunity":

> Master of human destinies am I!
> Fame, love, and fortune on my footsteps wait.
> Cities and fields I walk; I penetrate
> Deserts and seas remote, and passing by > Hovel and mart and palace, soon or late
> I knock unbidden once at every gate!
> If sleeping, wake; if feasting, rise before
> I turn away. It is the hour of fate,
> And they who follow me reach every state
> Mortals desire and conquer every foe
> Save death; but those who doubt or hesitate
> Condemned to failure, penury, and woe
> Seek me in vain and uselessly implore.
> I answer not, and I return no more!

"If sleeping, wake." You certainly were sleeping, lulled to rest by an unseen power. "If feasting, rise before I turn away." Oh, the irony of fate! You surely were feasting, and upon such meat, furnished by the invisible government, that your stomachs were gorged and your brains dazed; so dazed that President Roosevelt was compelled to lash you unmercifully with the whip of public sentiment in order to secure the passage of the Hepburn railroad bill, now unanimously acknowledged to be a righteous law. You were asleep on the Constitution, and when prodded into wakefulness you would rouse up and mumble plethorically: "It can't be done. It can't be done. It's unconstitutional." You had 16 years of continuous uninterrupted opportunity to respond to an insistent public demand on this great question and you failed and refused to grasp the opportunity, but with an air of supercilious nonchalance you adopted the slogan "The people be damned." And now the people have condemned you to failure and woe, and though you seek them in vain and uselessly implore, they answer not and will return to you no more. [Applause.]

Ah, yes; you agreed with a great captain of industry who loudly proclaimed the doctrine that you "can not unscramble eggs." Nevertheless you have lived to see the son of that same man come into camp and lay down his arms at the feet of Woodrow Wilson.

The father said, "The public be damned; you can not unscramble eggs." But in less than five years the son proceeds, apparently at least, to unscramble the eggs, and resigns from the directorate of more than 30 corporations in response, as he declares, to a righteous public sentiment which has recently been strongly against the old system of interlocking directorates.

Shortly after the J. P. Morgan Co. had announced its supposed surrender to public sentiment on the subject of interlocking directorates I introduced House resolution 364, which reads as follows:

Whereas it has been reported in the press of the country that the financial world was "startled to its depths" by the announcement of Mr. J. P. Morgan that the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. had resigned from the directorates of some 30 corporations, among which are the following: New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co., Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway, and the Michigan Central Railroad Co.; and

Whereas Mr. Morgan is reported as saying that these resignations were made possible by the change in public sentiment, which has recently been strongly against the old system of interlocking directorates; and

Whereas the New York Central system, through its board of interlocking directors, controls the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway and also the Michigan Central Railroad Co.; and

Whereas the New York Central owns and controls 89 per cent of the stock of the Michigan Central Railroad Co. and 90 per cent of the stock of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway; and

Whereas the board of directors of the New York Central system is composed of the following 13 men: William K. Vanderbilt, Marvin Hewitt, W. K. Vanderbilt, jr., George S. Bowdin, William H. Newman, Chauncey M. Depew, Frederick W. Vanderbilt, William C. Brown, Louis Cass Ledyard, James Stillman, William Rockefeller, J. P. Morgan, and George F. Baker; and

Whereas these 13 men hold 112 separate and distinct positions as directors in the New York Central, Michigan Central, Lake Shore & Michigan Southern, and other subsidiary lines; and

Whereas interlocking stock control confers all the powers which actually come from interlocking directorships; and

Whereas under the present system there is no honest competition between parallel railroad lines; and

Whereas the only purpose of legislation prohibiting interlocking directorates is to bring about a healthy and honest competition in the interest of the public between these great transportation companies: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to investigate and report to this House—

(a) The relations of railroad companies forming the so-called New York Central system and its subsidiary lines.

(b) The influence, if any, of the interlocking directorates of the New York Central system, including the Michigan Central Railroad Co. and the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway, upon railroad costs, service, and rates.

(c) The influence and effect, if any, of interlocking stock control upon railroad costs, service, and rates, as applied to the New York Central system and its subsidiary lines, including the Michigan Central Railroad Co. and the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway.

My purpose in asking the House to direct the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate and report to Congress the influence and effect of interlocking directorates upon railroad costs, service, and rates was to ascertain the true conditions and the actual effect, if any, upon railroad costs, service, and rates of interlocking directorates, and because I believed then and still believe that interlocking directorates is but one of the many symptoms of a disease which lies far deeper, and because I believed then and believe now that the dissolution of interlocking directorates will by no means remedy the evils of our present system. Such an investigation by the Interstate Commerce Commission and such a report would have furnished to the Congress an excellent foundation upon which proper legislation could have been framed to remedy existing evils.

Mr. Chairman, it does not require an expert to understand that where a majority of the stock of a railroad corporation or any other corporation is divided between two or more different corporations conducting the same line of business or traversing the same territory a gentleman's agreement to harmonize action is very likely to result.

Any physician will tell you that to cure a disease you must treat more than one of the symptoms.

A law which prohibits interlocking directorates will not reach the bottom if railroads or other corporations are permitted to own or control the stock of an actual or possible competitor. Perhaps the most efficient vehicle used by naturally competing railroad lines for the purpose of hoodwinking the public is the holding company. The Pennsylvania Co. is an excellent illustration. It does not actually own a mile of railroad track and yet operates the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. and all of its leased and controlled subsidiary lines west of Pittsburgh.

The friends of the holding company tell us the only purpose of such an organization is to hold the securities of railroad companies, and that such companies are very desirable as a means of equalizing the risks of investments for small stockholders. Whether or not that contention is true, it must nevertheless be admitted that the tremendous power of the holding company for centralizing and concentrating control renders it a dangerous and most undesirable part of the present system. Everybody knows that the policy of a railroad corporation is not determined by the bondholders, but by the stockholders. The stockholders alone have the right and the power, generally speaking, to vote, and a majority of the stock determines the right of control. There may be, and doubtless are, many instances where the stock of a corporation is held by 10,000 stockholders and among those 10,000 one stockholder owning 5 per cent of the entire stock. Does anyone doubt that this one man could determine the policy of his company against the combined position of all the rest of the stockholders?

The control of stock gives the power to name the board of directors, and the board of directors determines the course a railroad is to pursue in its business policy. The general effect of such a system can be seen in controlled traffic and the power to determine the earnings of the various lines operated by the system.

For many years the Republican Party, which placed the Sherman antitrust law upon the statute books of the Nation, was urged to make that law more effective, and by amendment or supplementary legislation to define more clearly its true meaning, in order that the business man engaged in interstate commerce might certainly know when his acts were in violation of law. The Republican Party refused to create an interstate trade commission and to strengthen the Sherman law by an act to prevent unfair competition. Through all these years the Republican Party insisted that the Sherman law was all sufficient to protect commerce against monopolies, when, as a matter of fact, the apparent effect of the Sherman law was to hasten the concentration of industry by driving the trust organization to the holding company and from that to complete merger of naturally competitive lines of business. This, of course, was exactly the opposite result from that which was intended by the framers of the Sherman law.

In spite of all this, a condition of lethargy seems to have settled down upon the Republican Party. They refused to keep step to the progress of the age, and went out of power forever, the victim of lost opportunity.

THE DEMOCRATIC PLAN.

The Democratic plan in dealing with this great question is founded upon the declaration in their platform that private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable. And now for the third and last time the Progressive Members of this House respectfully call the attention of the Democratic majority to the three bills introduced by the Progressive leader, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], on the 17th day of last November, covering this most important subject.

These measures were introduced for the purpose of carrying into effect the declarations in the National Progressive platform adopted in Chicago August 7, 1912. In that platform we declared for a strong national regulation of interstate corporations, and to that end for the establishment of a strong Federal administrative commission of high standing, which shall maintain permanent, active supervision over industrial corporations engaged in interstate commerce, or such of them as are of public importance, doing for them what the Government now does for the national banks, and what is now done for the railroads by the Interstate Commerce Commission. We declared that—

Such a commission must enforce the complete publicity of those corporate transactions which are of public interest; must attack unfair competition, false capitalization, special privilege; and, by continuous trained watchfulness, guard and keep open equally to all the highways of American commerce. Thus the business man will have certain knowledge of the law and will be able to conduct his business easily and in conformity therewith, the investor will find security for his capital, dividends will be rendered more certain, and the savings of the people will be drawn naturally and safely into the channels of trade. Under such a system of constructive regulation legitimate business, freed from confusion, uncertainty, and fruitless litigation, will develop normally in response to the energy and enterprise of the American business man.

Our first bill intended to carry into effect our platform pledges provides for the creation of an interstate trade commission, empowering such commission to require from all corporations subject to its jurisdiction information as to their organization, conduct, management, security holders, financial condition, and business transactions, in such degree and in such form as the commission may require; and to require from such corporations access at all reasonable times to their records, books, accounts, papers, and all other documents including the records of any of their committees; to point out and make public from time to time, in such form as in the discretion of the commission best advances fair, honest, and efficient business, all cases of material overcapitalization, unfair competition, misrepresentation, or oppressive use of credit of which any corporation may have been guilty, and present such case to the Attorney General for prosecution.

Our second bill is intended to prohibit and prevent unfair competition, and empowers and directs the interstate trade commission to prevent all corporations subject to its jurisdiction from engaging in or practicing unfair or oppressive competition in relation to the acceptance or procurement of rates or terms of service from common carriers not granted to other shippers under like conditions; prevents discrimination in selling prices, as between localities or individuals, which is not justified by differences in cost of distribution; prohibits the making of oppressive, exclusive contracts for the sale of articles of which the seller has a substantial monopoly; prevents the maintenance of secret subsidiaries or secretly controlled agencies, held out as independent of the corporation and used for the purpose of unfair competition; prevents the destruction of competition through the use of interlocking directorates; and any other business practices involving unfair or oppressive competition.

The third bill empowers the interstate trade commission, upon its own initiative or upon the complaint of any corporation or person, to investigate the organization, conduct, and management of any corporation subject to its jurisdiction for the purpose of determining whether such corporation exercises a substantial, monopolistic power in any industry in which said corporation is engaged; and empowers and directs the commission to determine by investigation whether such monopolistic power is based upon:

a. Control of natural resources,
b. Control of terminal or transportation facilities,
c. Control of financial resources, or any other economic condition inherent in the character of the industry.

These bills, if enacted into law, would remedy the evils of which we now complain, and would result in the immediate dissolution of the New York Central, New Haven, Pennsylvania, Baltimore & Ohio, Erie, and Chesapeake & Ohio, the six great railroad systems covering the eastern part of the United States which now own and control 57 railroads through intercorporate or individual ownership of stock. The necessity for drastic legislation which will prohibit the use of transportation companies for stock-jobbing purposes must be admitted by all who have given the subject careful consideration.

The St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad system was placed in the hands of a receiver last June because of its alleged inability to take up $2,500,000 of its 5 per cent notes. Investigation of the Frisco system developed some startling facts. It had an authorized capital of $200,000,000; its total paid-up stock was $49,000,000; its total bond issue, $320,000,000; the gross earnings of the system for the year 1912, $42,000,000; its net earnings only $12,000,000. It had sold within three years $72,000,000 worth of bonds, and within six months of the time application was made for a receiver these stock-jobbing pirates, under the leadership of B. F. Yoakum, had unloaded $26,000,000 of bonds in France, and in spite of all of this were unable to meet obligations amounting to only $2,500,000. The Interstate Commerce Commission, by its investigation, developed the amazing fact that over $40,000,000 had been pocketed by these financial sharks before they took the initial steps to bring about a reorganization of the company. Upon the heels of the Frisco receivership came the New Haven slaughter, very properly called by Senator NORRIS "its twin in infamy," through which millions of dollars were taken from more than 10,000 people, among whom were many widows and orphans.

Mr. Chairman, the evil practices which resulted in the wreck of these two railroad systems and the consequent financial ruin of thousands of their stockholders will never be stopped by the creation of a trade commission such as is proposed by our Democratic brethren. Why, even the New York World, which certainly can not be accused of any affection for the Progressive Party, in a recent editorial said:

President Wilson's trade commission is no more like the Roosevelt Progressive commission than the Constitution of the United States is like the code of Napoleon.

The real distinction between the proposed Democratic legislation on trusts and that proposed by the Progressive Party may be very well illustrated by comparing the interstate trade commission bill of the Democratic Party with the trade commission proposed by the Progressives.

The only purpose which the Democratic interstate trade commission will serve is that of news gathering for the courts and for Congress. Why should you limit the powers of your commission purely to matters of investigation if you really mean business? You got your idea of a trade commission from the Progressive platform, just as you did the presidential preference primary law. Why do not you put teeth into the trade commission by adopting our plan to define and punish violations of the law? Why do not you give your trade commission power to prevent unfair competition? When an unfair practice or violation of the law has been established by the commission, why not give that same body power to punish and prevent a repetition? The people are looking for results.

What do our Democratic brethren hope to accomplish by the enactment into law of House bill 15657, which is to be supplementary to existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, after defining commerce as trade among the several States and with foreign nations and the word "person" or "persons" as including corporations and associations existing under the laws of the United States? Our Democratic friends fall into the old trap of technical legal construction, which usually renders nugatory almost any punitive statute.

Section 2 provides that any person engaged in commerce who shall, directly or indirectly, discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities in the same or different sections of the country, providing such commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States, or anywhere under the jurisdiction of the United States, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be fined not exceeding $5,000 or imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court—and then they provide the joker—the discrimination in price must be made "with the purpose or intent to thereby destroy or wrongfully injure the business of a competitor." In other words, the person injured must prove intent to wrongfully injure him—a thing practically impossible to accomplish. Under this section it would be practically impossible for the Government to secure a conviction.

It is provided in section 3 that the owner, operator, or person controlling the product of any mine engaged in selling its products to commerce shall not refuse arbitrarily to sell such product to any responsible person, firm, or corporation who wishes to purchase for use, consumption, or resale within the United States. Here again the Government must show, when undertaking to enforce this law, that the refusal was an arbitrary refusal.

Perhaps the most glaring example of insincerity in this entire bill is to be found in sections 8 and 9, in relation to intercorporate stock control of naturally competitive railroad lines and the prohibition of interlocking directors of banks and other corporations.

Section 8 prohibits corporations engaged in commerce from acquiring, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or share capital of another corporation engaged in commerce (where the effect of such acquisition would eliminate, or substantially eliminate, competition between such corporations), and it further provides in the same section that "no corporation shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock of two or more corporations engaged in commerce, where the effect of such acquisition or the use of such stock by the voting or granting of proxies would eliminate or substantially lessen competition between such corporations;" and then provides that the section shall not apply to corporations purchasing such stock solely for investment.

It does not require the learning of a lawyer to perceive that the Government must be able to prove that the acquisition of such stock would actually lessen substantially the competition between the corporations. It is not enough for the Government to show that such intercorporate stock control affects or lessens competition between the corporations, but it must also be shown that it substantially affects such competition. Do you imagine that with the shrewd railroad manipulator on the other side the Government could ever prove such a case? Why not take the bull by the horns and absolutely prohibit intercorporate stock ownership or control?

This section was doubtless intended to abolish the holding company. Why then nullify its effect by providing that nothing contained in the section shall prevent a corporation engaged in commerce from causing the formation of subsidiary corporations for the actual carrying on of their immediate lawful business and that no railroad company shall be prohibited from extending any of its lines by the acquisition of stock or otherwise of any other railroad company when there is no substantial competition between such companies? The effect of such provisions is simply to invite an evasion of the very purpose of the law.

If you hope to accomplish real results, my Democratic friends, you must not only stop the practice of interlocking directorates, you must prohibit stock watering, voting trusts, holding companies, intercorporate stock control, individual interlocking stock control of naturally competing railroads and other lines of business, and, above all, there must be a complete and drastic reformation of the laws under which insolvent railroads and other industrial corporations are now permitted to affect a reorganization.

Mr. Chairman, I am firmly convinced that this character of legislation will never be enacted under our present system of secret caucus and executive committee session, under cover of which the property power in politics can wield such a tremendous influence without showing its hand. All men in public life know that up to 1907 the special interests politically had been on the defensive. Their determination to prevent legislation in the interest of the people was their chief purpose. Since that time, however, they have made an aggressive fight for legislation intended to multiply and perpetuate their advantages over the people.

Firmly entrenched behind high-tariff walls, as they have been for years, the special interests in politics had been content to grow through combinations of corporations, through holding companies and mergers, until in the year 1908 this monster of monopoly had a capitalization of $31,672,160,754, more than half of which was water. Then it was that they boldly entered the arena of legislation for the purpose of legalizing their watered stocks and compelling the people to pay dividends on their fictitious billions. This inhuman monster absolutely controls the market prices of everything the farmer sells, of everything the consumer buys, and in addition it controls transportation, manufacture, mining, capital, and credit. Under its deadly influence the Senate of Seward, Sumner, and Clay became the Senate of Foraker, Guggenheim, and Lorimer.

The decision of the special interests to compel the people to pay dividends on $15,000,000,000 of water had much to do with the high cost of living. It is now a well-known fact that this tremendous power was delighted with the Aldrich currency scheme, the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, the Taft-Wickersham railroad bill, and Canadian reciprocity. During this period Aldrich was supreme in the Senate by means of the closed committee and secret caucus. His control of the machinery of legislation was absolute, as was that of Cannon in the House.

The Progressives maintain that every standing committee shall be compelled to keep a record of its action; that the executive session shall be a thing of the dark and devious past; that there shall be no back doors to the Senate or the House; that the secret party caucus must be abolished; and that the business of the people must be transacted in the open.

Mr. Chairman, this evolution and revolution can never be realized by either the Democratic or Republican Party. They are both firmly embedded in the traditions and methods of the past.

A new party, free and untrammeled, clean, strong, and responsive to the new thought of the age, unembarrassed by traditions, unfettered by the system, must and will take up the people's cause and carry it forward to final triumph. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I confess that I do not often acknowledge a wrong, and when I do I am sorry for it. I am sorry I did the gentleman from Illinois the injustice to insist that he was not speaking on the subject. I overlooked the fact that he opened his able oration by saying that he was going to vote for the bill. I think that overbalances anything he could say against the bill, and I confess that I made a mistake, and I will not do it again. [Laughter and applause.] I would like very much to introduce to the committee the brilliant young Member from Missouri, the baby of our committee. He is a lusty infant, making progress rapidly. The older Members will have to look to their laurels or he will distance them. I now yield to the able, eloquent, and indefatigably industrious gentleman from Missouri, Mr. DECKER.

[Mr. DECKER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Minnesota will use some time now.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to reply to my friend from Missouri [Mr. DECKER], for I appreciate very much most of what he said. I can not agree entirely with all that he said, for I take from his arguments that trusts and monopolies are fostered almost entirely by a protective tariff.

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. DECKER. I did not wish to convey that impression. I realize that there are other causes of trusts besides the tariff.

Mr. FESS. I am glad to hear that statement, because I do not want to direct my thought in that line, and I would be compelled to do so if that was his utterance.

I arise to state why I am going to support this measure. [Applause.] One distinguished publicist of our country expressed the genius of American movement industrially by announcing that equal opportunity in the rivalry of life is the distinguishing principle of activity, and anything that will interfere with this equal opportunity for you or me to rival one another in the pursuit of happiness ought to be subject to legislation. I have stood as an advocate of the principle that in trade natural law should be allowed to take its own course, unless there would be evils to grow out of it; that individual effort should be, as much as possible, unrestrained. But if individual effort interferes with public welfare, it must be regulated. And you can see that evils do grow out of trade taking its natural course, and, therefore, legal enactment must come in to interfere somewhat with the natural course. Once it was said that competition was the life of trade, and that statement stood as an industrial aphorism for years. Later on people said that in this keen, unlimited, unrestricted competition, competition becomes the dearth of trade, or the death of trade; and many of our authors point to incidents of paralleling of railroads, where one railroad almost entirely kills the prosperity of another, and therefore, they said, instead of competition being the life of trade it has come to be the death of trade. These two statements might be taken as the utterances of two schools of industrialism. I do not put it that way, but I express it in this way, that where combination is possible competition is impossible. In other words, combination is the refuge of those who seek to avert the evils of competition. And I announce it as a fundamental principle that where competing firms, represented by individual units, each one with its complete organization, are competing against one another these competing firms will continue in competition just so long as they can not combine, and the moment they can combine they will do so to avoid the necessity to compete.

Here in one section of the country is a unit in steel railway production; yonder in another part of the country is a second unit; here in another part is a third unit. Throughout the United States there are 200 units. They recognize that each unit has its own individual organization, which entails great expense. Each had to have its president and its directorate; each had to have provisions for its overhead charges, each one maintaining for itself an expensive organization. These companies came to the conclusion that they could supersede these 200 separate organizations by one corporation by a combination. They could have one organization, one president, and one directorate, and they could in this way reduce expenses, cut off needless expenditures, reduce prices, and increase profits; but by so doing competition would cease because combination became possible. In this way the United States Steel Corporation was organized. You have the Standard Oil Corporation, but not quite analogous, as it grew by its ability to prevent much competition. You have the American Tobacco Corporation, the Whisky Trust, the Salt Trust, the Shippers' Trust, and numerous other trusts throughout the country made up of combinations, because these could supersede competition. Wherever competitors became strong, a remedy was sought in combination. This is not due to tariff legislation; it is due to a law of trade.

Now, I had believed that so long as you could maintain competition without any interference at all with the rights of the people, probably it would be better to stand by the natural law and obey the dictates of President Jefferson when he said, "The best government is the one that governs the least."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANTOR. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The request is not in order, under the rule.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. I want to thank the gentleman in charge of the time and the Members of the House. I am speaking somewhat extemporaneously on a theme that I have thought a great deal about. And this is the proposition that I was about to announce: That, other things being equal, I would prefer the Government keep its hands off of the laws of trade. The modern tendencies of industry point to combination rather than competition. It finds its best expression in the term "big business." This tendency of the hour is the result of newer methods of business. It has called into being the famous organizations of enterprise and has brought to light the new captains of industry. The modern method of doing business will perhaps prove its worth by continuing its processes, for we will hardly go back to primitive methods. I think no one desires to return to the stagecoach; all prefer the modern twentieth century train.

But when it comes to the point where business interferes with the pursuit of happiness, by allowing individual or corporate property to interfere with public welfare or with the right of accumulating property for the purpose of the general welfare, as well as for individual profit, then the law must step in to either correct the wrong or prevent a repetition of it, or both. That would be legitimate. In the last 20 years we have seen the steps leading to the present business organization. First the pools, then the combination, then the holding company, and later the complete merger. We have noticed individual entities growing to such fabulous dimensions that you and I and many thoughtful citizens have become alarmed. I confess, as a citizen of this Republic, that when I realize how much wealth has come into the possession of an individual I am alarmed. I do not know how much the distinguished financier whose name is so frequently mentioned is worth, but it has been stated that he is worth at least $900,000,000. If that be true, it is simply bewildering. Nobody can comprehend it. Suppose that Adam, 6,000 years ago, had come into the world upon a salary of $100,000 a year, and suppose that he had not spent a single dollar of it——

Mr. CANTOR. On clothes [laughter]——

Mr. FESS. Suppose that he had saved $100,000 a year for 6,000 years. He would not now be worth more than two-thirds of what at least one American citizen is supposed to be worth. It would require $50,000 a year for 6,000 years for Eve's salary [laughter], added to Adam's, to make $900,000,000. [Laughter and applause.]

I tell you, my friends, when a statement of that kind can be made, that in a single lifetime a man who is still living, starting with nothing, as a poor boy, has accumulated beyond the most fanciful dreams of the wildest imagination; this wizard in finance comes to the point where he is worth such a fabulous sum, one must tremble at the thought of the possibilities involved. He might be a saint, and I am the last man to rise on the floor of this House and say unkind, cruel, and ugly words against anybody because he might possess wealth; but I say that the very fact that any one man has such tremendous power, financially, though he be an angel, makes me tremble, for I think what he might do with it for the injury of his fellow men if he wanted to use it in that way.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will yield to me, I will give him a minute of time.

Mr. FESS. Very well.

Mr. ADAMSON. I want to say that on Saturday testimony was submitted to our committee that the profits of a pipe-line oil company in one year were 2,900 per cent on a capitalization of $1,000,000, and the next year they made 84 per cent profit on the $30,000,000.

Mr. FESS. Now, Mr. Chairman, when such a statement as that made by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is before us, I am of opinion that this Congress has the right to legislate in those matters. Therefore I believe that it opens a legitimate field of legislation. In such a case corrective legislation, though restrictive, is wise.

Mr. ADAMSON. Our committee is going after that proposition right now.

Mr. FESS. I believe that while we may see some danger in passing over to the proposed trade commission certain power, yet I believe that this trade-commission bill is merely supplemental; it adds to the laws that we now have. It does not interfere with their effectiveness, but rather assists, as I see it. It is an additional step toward doing what we have not been able to do thus far. I will say that, and if it is any honor to the Democratic membership of this House I, as a Republican, say it with congratulation to your side of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And when I say it I trust that the Democratic membership of this House will also be willing to say that the Sherman antitrust law, a Republican measure, while it has been in some respects ineffective, has had a good effect on the whole, and has been a step in the right direction also. [Applause.]

I would hate to see the Sherman law repudiated. I would not want to subtract from it. Upon it has been built a body of decisions which are most valuable to the Nation. I would like to define it and make it clear, so that business men and business concerns may know whether they are within its requirements or without; and then I would like to add to the Sherman law a regulatory power that would make it possible for the commission to meet a single situation or individual incident where it is a violation of the Sherman antitrust law, that power being directed without throwing the country into an uproar by bringing it up here in the House or in the Senate. This commission can thus perform the function of a corrective without disturbing all business. That is why I have always been in favor of adjusting the tariff by a commission, rather than by bringing it before the Congress. While my Democratic friends do not agree with that, I believe that ultimately they will come to that position [applause] for the same reason they now indorse this Republican idea of an interstate trade commission.

I said a moment ago the Sherman law had not been effective in all matters, yet a glance at the history of its operations is sufficient to convince an unbiased citizen of the salutary influence on the country.

During the administration of Harrison 8 cases—5 by the Government and 3 by private parties—were initiated. During Cleveland's second term 18 cases—10 by the Government and 8 by private parties—were prosecuted. During McKinley's administration 17 cases—6 by the Government and 11 by private parties—were prosecuted. During Roosevelt's administration 44 cases were prosecuted. In President Taft's administration the major part of the work of the Department of Justice was taken up by prosecutions under the Sherman law. It would take a very bold man to declare that the Sherman law was a dead letter. On the other hand, the Republican administrations were so active in its enforcement that many good people were led to think the policy of the Government had come to be one of persecution rather than stimulation, of destructive application rather than constructive legislation.

Believing as I do in the principle of cooperation in business and readily seeing the advantage of the modern system of business organization, when kept within the law, I desire to preserve the Sherman law, and am willing to supplement it by a trade commission in line with the recommendation of President Taft and the Republican Party.

Therefore I am going to give my hearty support to this trade commission bill. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, how does the time stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] has 55 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Georgia has 66 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Has the gentleman from Minnesota any other speaker?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Not here. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] asked for time, but he does not seem to be here.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not like to lose any time, Mr. Chairman, but although several gentlemen have asked for time no one seems to be ready to occupy the floor at this moment, and so I shall have to move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MOON having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HULL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Wednesday, May 20, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 20, 1914.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come to Thee day by day, knowing that human wisdom and human strength are not sufficient for human life. The great problems that confront us can never be solved in the light of common day. But Thou dost give to us to live our lives in a spiritual atmosphere, charged with tokens of Thy love and powers of Thy grace, and Thou dost come with Thy gentle ministry upon the hearts and minds of Thy people, leading them to fulfill a divine plan. Help us to-day to know the guidance of God and to submit our lives to Thy holy will, that we may fulfill all the commission that Thou hast put into our hands and measure up to the responsibilities of Christian statesmen. For Christ's sake. Amen.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary (James M. Baker) read the following communication:

PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE, UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, May 20, 1914.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate I appoint Hon. GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK, a Senator from the State of Nebraska, to perform the duties of the chair during my absence.

President pro tempore.

Mr. HITCHCOCK thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer for the day.

INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4632) for the relief of settlers on the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, in the State of North Dakota, and the Cheyenne River and Standing Rock Indian Reservations, in the States of South Dakota and North Dakota, which were, on page 1, line 4, to strike out "and directed"; on page 2, line 3, after "effect," to insert "the act of Congress approved May 27, 1910, entitled 'An act to authorize the sale and disposition of the surplus and unallotted lands in Bennett County, in the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, and making appropriation to carry the same into effect,' and the act approved May 30, 1910, entitled 'An act to authorize the sale and disposition of a portion of the surplus and unallotted lands in Mellette and Washabaugh Counties, in the Rosebud Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect'"; on page 3, line 2, to strike out "said"; on page 3, line 2, after "lands," to insert "in said reservations"; and to amend the title so as to read: "An act for the relief of settlers on the Fort Berthold, Cheyenne River, Standing Rock, Rosebud, and Pine Ridge Indian Reservations, in the States of North and South Dakota."

Mr. CRAWFORD. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives. This is a bill in which my constituents are interested, as are also those of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], and the amendments were made at the instance of the Representatives from those States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. KERN rose.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Smith, Md.
Brady	Gallinger	Nelson	Smoot
Brandegee	Hitchcock	Norris	Sterling
Bristow	Hollis	O'Gorman	Sutherland
Bryan	Hughes	Overman	Swanson
Burleigh	James	Page	Thompson
Burton	Johnson	Perkins	Thornton
Catron	Jones	Pittman	Townsend
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Ransdell	Vardaman
Clapp	Kern	Robinson	Walsh
Clark, Wyo.	La Follette	Saulsbury	West
Crawford	Lane	Shafroth	Works
Culberson	Lea, Tenn.	Sheppard
Cummins	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I was requested to announce for the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] that he is absent from the Senate this morning on business of the Senate, conducting hearings before the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS], and to state that he has a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. KERN. I ask unanimous consent for the following agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed agreement.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Wednesday, May 27, 1914, immediately upon the conclusion of the remarks of Senator STERLING, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill H. R. 14385, the Panama tolls bill, and that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. on that calendar day the Senate will proceed, without further debate, to vote upon any amendment that may be pending and upon the bill—through the regular parliamentary stages—to its final disposition, and that no amendment offered later than Monday, May 25, will be considered.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, it is the earnest desire of a number of Senators on both sides that I shall make a proposition for a unanimous-consent agreement this morning. The bill has already been very fully debated. The arguments on either side have been very able, exhaustive, and illuminating. I think no greater debate has occurred in this body in many years. It has seemed to many of us that everything that can be said on either side will have been said by the date named, and that to continue an indefinite debate would be inconsistent with the desire that everyone has for an early adjournment.

It is desired, if agreeable to a majority of the Senate, of course, that the meetings of the Senate should commence at 11 o'clock in the morning and be carried on until such time in the evening as would be necessary to give all Senators who might desire to speak full opportunity to be heard. Notices have been given for one speech on the 21st, one on the 22d, one on the 25th, one on the 26th, and another on the 27th. It is believed that the Senate can very well accommodate itself to at least three, four, or five speeches in a single day if they are not too long. I hope that we may be able to agree to vote at the time suggested.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was not in the Chamber when the request for a unanimous-consent agreement was submitted, and I rise simply to ask the Senator what date he has proposed?

Mr. KERN. The 27th of May, one week from to-day; no amendment to be considered that is offered after Monday.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the time has not yet arrived to fix a definite date for a vote upon the bill. I therefore object to any unanimous-consent agreement at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 661) for the relief of the widow of Thomas B. Mr. KENYON. I have a telegram in the nature of a petition from the mayor and committee of Beacon, Iowa, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BEACON, IOWA, May 7, 1914.

Hon. W. S. KENYON.
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

Whereas in the industrial strife that has existed for more than half a year in the State of Colorado, many men, women, and children have been slaughtered by hired assassins, upon whom have been conferred the power and authority of the State; and

Whereas the greedy and inhuman corporation that has been guilty of these atrocious crimes must be prevented from shedding more human blood; and

Whereas not only in the State of Colorado, but in every State in which thousands of unorganized men and women are employed, industrial conditions are as oppressive and unjust as were those that produced the world's bloody revolutions; and

Whereas we believe that the Federal Government should intervene in our industrial affairs for the purpose of safeguarding human rights: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, citizens of Beacon, Iowa, urge Congress to enact a law requiring the operator of any industry in which 100 or more persons are employed to obtain a Federal charter under which all the workmen's rights, including the right to band themselves together in labor unions, would be protected. Forfeiture of such charter should be the penalty for violation of any of its provisions, and the Government should be authorized to take over and operate the forfeited industry until such time as the owner would bond himself to meet the requirements of the law; and be it further

Resolved, That we hereby petition Congress to pass the bill introduced by Senator MARTINE that prohibits blood-thirsty corporations from employing guards to murder workmen and their wives and children.

Respectfully submitted by

SOL MEEK,
Mayor and Chairman.

THE COLORADO STRIKE.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I send to the desk resolutions which have been passed by the General Assembly of the State of Colorado, and I ask that they may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Certificate.]

STATE OF COLORADO,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
State of Colorado, ss:

I, James B. Pearce, secretary of state of the State of Colorado, do hereby certify that the annexed is a full, true, and complete transcript of the house joint resolution No. 3, by Mr. Fincher, which was filed in this office the 15th day of May, A. D. 1914, at 12.43 o'clock p. m., and admitted to record.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Colorado, at the city of Denver, this 15th day of May, A. D. 1914.

House joint resolution 3.

Whereas the public mind, not only in Colorado but elsewhere throughout the country, has been agitated and unsettled through the publication and circulation of conflicting statements concerning the facts related with the unfortunate industrial strife prevailing in the coal fields of Colorado; and

Whereas by reason of such conflicting publications and statements the conditions attending the situation have been intensified and the good name and material interests of the State have greatly suffered: Be it

Resolved, That the general assembly, now in extraordinary session, declares that the people of Colorado, no less than the people of any other State in the Union, recognize that the first and highest duty of the citizen is to respect and render obedience to the law; that there can be no freedom, no justice, under any government where life and property are not safe and secure. That the people of the State of Colorado are firmly resolved to preserve law and order in this State and protect life and property therein and to punish those guilty of violation of law without regard to their association, condition, or position. That the general assembly, so convened in extraordinary session, hereby pledges the entire power and, if necessary, the entire resources of the State to the restoration of peace and order, the preservation of the sovereignty of the State, and the maintenance of the government under the Constitution and laws of the country; be it

Resolved, That this resolution be spread upon the journals of the house and senate and that a copy thereof be sent to the President of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to Members of the Colorado delegation in Congress.

J. H. SLATTERY,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
STEPHEN R. FITZGERALD,
President of the Senate.

Approved May 15, 1914, 12.16 p. m.

Governor of the State of Colorado.

JAMES B. PEARCE,
Secretary of State,
By THOMAS F. DILLON, Jr.,
Deputy.

Filing clerk, D., Jr.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to ask the Senator from Colorado if the Legislature of the State of Colorado has adjourned?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; I understand it adjourned on Saturday evening last.

Mr. BORAH. Did it take any steps to provide for taking care of the situation in Colorado?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It provided for the issuing of a million dollars in bonds for the purpose of raising money to pay the past expenses of the national guard of that State and also for other needs that may arise. The amount which has been expended up to this time is about $680,000, which leaves a surplus of $320,000 for expenditures in the future should it be needed.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the only act upon the part of the legislature, then, was to provide for the expenses of the militia forces of the State?

Mr. SHAFROTH. There was also passed a bill giving certain powers to the State with regard to the seizing of arms at any time the governor should make proclamation; an act was also passed giving to the State authorities the power absolutely to close saloons in times when troubles of this character exist. Those were the three bills passed.

There was also submitted a bill to provide for compulsory arbitration.

Mr. BORAH. That is what I was interested in.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That bill was defeated in the house and did not get to the senate. It seems that both sides were opposed to the bill—both the operators and the strikers. The result was that no headway could be made upon that.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to ask further if the difficulty there has been adjusted?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; it has not been adjusted as yet. Of course, they are endeavoring to adjust it every day. The troops of the United States have been called in and are now upon the ground—not a great many, but it does not take many United States soldiers to preserve order. There is no hostility seemingly between the strikers and the United States troops. On that account very few are necessary. I think there are probably three or four hundred United States soldiers there, whereas there were perhaps fifteen or eighteen hundred of the militia there previous to that time.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BRYAN, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1269) for the adjudication and determination of the claims arising under joint resolution of July 14, 1870, authorizing the Postmaster General to continue in use in the Postal Service Marcus P. Norton's combined postmarking and stamp-canceling hand-stamp patents, or otherwise, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 530) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 65) to amend Senate joint resolution 34, approved May 12, 1898, entitled "Joint resolution providing for the adjustment of certain claims of the United States against the State of Tennessee and certain claims against the United States," reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 531) thereon.

Mr. BRADY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4221) for the relief of Charles L. Roe, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on Claims, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 8893) for the relief of Mary E. Goodley (Rept. No. 535);

A bill (H. R. 10767) for the relief of John D. Baldwin (Rept. No. 532); and

A bill (H. R. 12166) for the relief of Jennie S. Sherman or her heirs (Rept. No. 533).

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 4077) for the relief of Mary E. Goodley, submitted an adverse report (No. 534) thereon, which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12778) for the relief of W. D. Stoyer, administrator of the estate of Henry S. Stoyer, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 536) thereon.

LIEUT. JAMES P. BARNEY.

Mr. BRISTOW. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 9147) to restore First Lieut. James P. Barney, retired, to the active list of the Army, and I submit a report (No. 529) thereon. I call the attention of the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] to the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the Senator from Virginia state why it is necessary that the bill should be acted upon at this time.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, this is a time when we need officers in the Army. The department has recommended that Lieut. Barney be restored to the active list of the Army. Some time ago upon examination he was found to be sick and was retired against his own wishes. His health has since been completely restored. He is now on the retired list receiving three-fourths pay, and this bill proposes to restore him to the active list of the Army. It seems to me that if the Government wants men in the present emergency it would be to the interest of the service to restore to the active list as promptly as it can be done this efficient and capable officer.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; if the Government desires his services, there is no question about that at all.

Mr. SWANSON. We had better prepare for an emergency, in any event.

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill has not been read, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the bill carry any additional pay to the officer during the time he has been retired?

Mr. SWANSON. I think not. He was retired on three-fourths pay.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then it does not carry any additional pay?

Mr. SWANSON. It does not carry any additional pay. He was retired, as I have said, against his own wishes, and his health has been entirely restored.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I object to the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I understood unanimous consent had been granted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It had not been granted. The Chair gave time for the purpose and understood that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] was about to object, but he did not do so. The objection was made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not make objection, but I asked that the bill be read. The Secretary had only read the title, and I thought it proper that the bill should be read at length. I did not make objection at any point.

Mr. SWANSON. I think the RECORD will show that the Chair inquired if there was objection, and there was no objection made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair had made no announcement, but recognized the Senator from North Dakota, who has objected to the consideration of the bill, and it will go to the calendar.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, there is a bill, S. 3404, covering the same subject matter as the House bill just reported by me, and which I report adversely from the Committee on Military Affairs, with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed, as that course will be necessary if the House bill is to be passed. I ask that the Senate bill go to the calendar with the House bill reported favorably.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire present action upon the report he is now submitting?

Mr. BRISTOW. No; I do not desire action upon it until the House bill has been passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire the Senate bill to be placed on the calendar?

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire it to go to the calendar until the House bill has been acted upon; then I shall move its indefinite postponement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

SALT LAKE CITY (UTAH) WATER SUPPLY.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably, with an amendment, the bill (S. 4741) for the protection of the water supply of the city of Salt Lake City, Utah, and I submit a report (No. 537) thereon.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, this is a bill of local application only and is a matter of considerable importance to my home city of Salt Lake. I therefore ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill. It is short and will take only a moment. I will also say that it has the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill be read first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. The amendment of the Committee on Public Lands was, on page 3, after line 18, to strike out section 2, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the lands heretofore described and reserved for municipal water-supply purposes shall be administered by and at the expense of the city of Salt Lake City, under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, for the purpose of storing, conserving, and protecting from pollution the water supply, and preserving the timber on said lands to more fully accomplish such purposes, and to that end said city shall have the right, subject to approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, to the use of any and all parts of the lands reserved for the storage and conveying of water and the construction and maintenance thereon of all improvements for such purposes.

And insert:

SEC. 2. That the lands heretofore described and reserved for municipal water-supply purposes shall be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture, at the expense of and in cooperation with the city of Salt Lake City, for the purpose of storing, conserving, and protecting from pollution the said water supply, and preserving, improving, and increasing the timber growth on said lands to more fully accomplish such purposes; and to that end said city shall have the right, subject to approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, to the use of any and all parts of the lands reserved for the storage and conveying of water and construction and maintenance thereon of all improvements for such purposes.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the public lands within the several townships and subdivisions thereof hereinafter enumerated, situate in the county of Salt Lake, State of Utah, are hereby reserved from all forms of location, entry, or appropriation, whether under the mineral or non-mineral land laws of the United States, and set aside as a municipal water-supply reserve for the use and benefit of the city of Salt Lake City, a municipal corporation of the State of Utah, as follows, to wit: The south half of the south half of section 9; the south half of the southwest quarter and the southeast quarter of section 10; the south half of section 11; section 12; section 13; section 14; section 15; section 16; the northeast quarter and south half of section 17; the south half of the south half of section 18; section 19; section 20; section 21; section 22; section 23; section 24; section 25; section 26; section 27; section 28; the north half of section 29; the north half of the north half of section 33; the north half of the north half of section 34; section 35; section 36, in township 1 north, range 1 east, of Salt Lake base and meridian; all of township 1 north, range 2 east of Salt Lake base and meridian; the south half of section 32; the south half of section 33; the south half of the south half of section 34; the south half of section 35, in township 2 north, range 2 east of Salt Lake base and meridian; the south half of section 7; the west half of the west half of section 17; section 18; section 19; section 30; section 31, in township 1 north, range 3 east, of Salt Lake base and meridian; section 1; section 2; the northeast quarter of section 11; section 12; section 13; section 24, in township 1 south, range 1 east, of Salt Lake base and meridian; section 1; section 2; section 3; section 4; section 5; section 6; section 7; section 8; section 9; section 10; section 11; section 12; section 13; section 14; section 15; section 16; section 17; section 18; section 19; section 20; section 21; section 22; section 23; section 24; the north half of section 25, in township 1 south, range 2 east, of Salt Lake base and meridian; the west half and the southeast quarter of section 5; section 6; section 7; section 8; the west half of the west half of section 9; the west half of the west half of section 16; section 17; section 18; section 19; section 20; the west half and the southeast quarter of section 21; the west half of section 27; section 28; section 29; section 30; the north half of section 32; the north half of section 33; the northwest quarter of section 34, in township 1 south, range 3 east, of Salt Lake base and meridian.

SEC. 2. That the lands heretofore described and reserved for municipal water-supply purposes shall be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture at the expense of and in cooperation with the city of Salt Lake City, for the purpose of storing, conserving, and protecting from pollution the said water supply, and preserving, improving, and increasing the timber growth on said lands to more fully accomplish such purposes; and to that end said city shall have the right, subject to approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, to the use of any and all parts of the lands reserved, for the storage and conveying of water and construction and maintenance thereon of all improvements for such purposes.

SEC. 3. That in addition to the authority given the Secretary of Agriculture under the act of June 4, 1897 (30 Stats., p. 35), he is hereby authorized to prescribe and enforce such regulations as he may find necessary to carry out the purpose of this act, including the right to forbid persons other than forest officers and those authorized by the municipal authorities from entering or otherwise trespassing upon these lands, and any violation of this act or of regulations issued thereunder shall be punishable as is provided for in section 50 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States, approved March 4, 1909" (35 Stats. L., p. 1098), as amended by the act of Congress approved June 25, 1910 (36 Stats. L., p. 857).

SEC. 4. That this act shall be subject to all legal rights heretofore acquired under any law of the United States, and the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to inquire how many acres of land are proposed to be set aside by this bill?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I can not answer the Senator as to the precise number, because a very large portion of the land is already owned by the city of Salt Lake. I think more than half of it is owned by the city in fee. Probably three or four thousand acres, I should think, altogether are involved.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from Colorado desires to know exactly, I will read the figures from the report accompanying the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not care particularly about that. The information that three or four thousand acres are involved is sufficient.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the report on the bill prepared by me may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report referred to is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 537, Sixty-third Congress, second session.]

PROTECTION OF THE WATER SUPPLY OF THE CITY OF SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands, submitted the following report, to accompany S. 4741:

The Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 4741) for the protection of the water supply of the city of Salt Lake City, Utah, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report it back to the Senate with the following amendment:

Pages 3 and 4, strike out all of section 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. That the lands heretofore described and reserved for municipal water-supply purposes shall be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture, at the expense of and in cooperation with the city of Salt Lake City, for the purpose of storing, conserving, and protecting from pollution the said water supply, and preserving, improving, and increasing the timber growth on said lands to more fully accomplish such purposes; and to that end said city shall have the right, subject to approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, to the use of any and all parts of the lands reserved, for the storage and conveying of water and construction and maintenance thereon of all improvements for such purposes."

As thus amended the committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The above bill contemplates the withdrawal of several townships and subdivisions of townships in the county of Salt Lake, State of Utah, so as to embrace the watersheds in the vicinity of the city of Salt Lake City, and thus afford protection to the water supply of said city.

The city of Salt Lake City at present owns upward of 20,000 acres of land situate in the drainage basins of the creeks from which it gets its water. Here and there all over these lands are little springs and water holes which help to feed the streams from which the city draws its water. Most of these watershed lands were bought from the Union Pacific Railroad Co. The patent to the railroad company, as well as the law making the grant, provides that mineral lands are excepted.

Under cover of mineral locations, squatters are seizing the favored spots in the city watersheds to get the springs thereon. The watersheds are not mineral land. No mine or quarry has been developed on any of them, and no mineral entry seems to be made in any place that does not contain a spring. However, a trace of mineral or limestone or anything else may serve as a pretext for a location to one who wants a spring.

The above bill has been drawn to prevent the contamination of the watersheds surrounding the city by locations made by squatters of a more or less speculative nature.

The land embraced in these watersheds is clearly of a nonmineral character, as set forth in the letter herewith of Mr. Edward R. Zalinski, mining engineer, Salt Lake City, Utah, and addressed to the mayor and commissioners of Salt Lake City.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, November 12, 1913.

The MAYOR AND COMMISSIONERS,
Salt Lake City.

GENTLEMEN: In reply to your question as to the character of the lands within the watersheds of City Creek, Dry Creek, Red Butte Creek, Emigration Canyon Creek, and Parleys Creek—as included within the yellow lines on the watershed map of Salt Lake City, a copy of which was given me—I beg to say that in my opinion, based on familiarity with the ground for the past eight years and on a recent inspection of the same, the land has no value as mineral ground, except possibly in a broader sense, for limestone or other quarries, and gravel pits.

Regarding the geology, the country rocks are chiefly limestone and quartzite, with minor quantities of lime shale, sandstone, and conglomerate. There is also a relatively small amount of extrusive or volcanic rock.

The lands in question are classified by the United States Geological Survey, and are shown on the geologic map of North America—Professional Paper 71, plate 1C. This is the latest geologic map of this section, published in 1912, being more up to date than the earlier map of the fortieth parallel survey.

As shown on the latest map, these lands consist of: Carboniferous, undivided (blue, with horizontal hatching on map, symbol No. 14); also some Upper Cretaceous (color green, symbol No. 7, on map); Tertiary effusives (color red, symbol 25); besides these there are the Quaternary gravel beds of the lake benches (light yellow or cream color on map, symbol No. 1).

As to the occurrence of mineral, the beds for the greater part are moderately tilted, with relatively little bending or crumpling of the strata, such as is favorable for ore deposits. There is no important fissuring or faulting; the lands lie east of the Wasatch fault. There are no porphyry intrusions that the writer knows of. These usually accompany mineralization and are present in all of the mining camps of the State.

What might possibly be taken for porphyry is the extrusive or volcanic rock, mostly latite, an eruptive form of a monzonite magma. At Bingham this is later than the mineralization and is nowhere associated with the ore deposits.

This section is not in any recognized mineral district. There has been more or less prospecting, but in the last 50 years, since the fall of 1863, when mining was first started in Utah, no valuable mineral deposits have been discovered or developed.

To sum up, the land embraced within the watersheds is clearly nonmineral ground.

Yours, very truly, EDWARD R. ZALINSKI.

With respect to this withdrawal, the matter was submitted to the Department of the Interior, and in a letter from the Secretary thereof, filed herewith, it will be noted that special legislation is needed in order to accomplish the purpose sought by the city of Salt Lake City, Utah:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 4, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE SUTHERLAND,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In response to your request of December 30, 1913, for a report relative to the watershed desired by Salt Lake City to be withdrawn for a water-supply site, I have the honor to submit herewith a copy of a letter from the Director of the Geological Survey describing the land and stating its geographical character. With the papers submitted to you is a diagram showing the lands desired to be withdrawn inclosed in yellow lines. The lands therein colored red are designated on said map as "city land," and I assume that the most of it has been purchased from the Union Pacific Railroad Co. The records of the General Land Office show the total area of the land to be about 67,388.45 acres, of which there has been patented to the Union Pacific Railroad Co., upon its selections, 25,120.27 acres; that preemption patents cover 1,280 acres; patented homestead entries cover 5,277.11 acres; patented soldiers' additional homestead entries, 348.75 acres; approved State selections, 3,850.08; school lands granted to the State in sections 2, 16, 32, and 36, 5,423.30 acres; patented desert-land entries, 697.91 acres; patented timber-culture entries, 40 acres; and patented mineral entries, 1,018.90, making the total area of patented lands 43,057.22 acres, leaving an unpatented area of 24,331.23 acres.

There is also a pending mineral entry for 440 acres and a pending desert-land entry for 280 acres, and 160 acres have been reserved for ranger station and administration site for the Forest Service. One State selection is pending for 40 acres, and a reservation for Fort Douglas contains 200 acres. Permission has also been granted by the Forest Service to the Knight Power Co. for use of 80 acres. Omitting the last-mentioned tract, said pending selections, entries, and reserved land aggregate 1,120 acres.

It is stated in the director's letter that a withdrawal would not affect bona fide claims now in existence, but would prevent entries and selections under the nonmineral laws and the filing of additional claims under the laws applied to nonmetalliferous minerals, "but would not fully protect the city." It appears that a good portion of the unpatented area is covered by the forest reserve, and the withdrawal thereof for the national forest will protect the city, as to such lands, for the present, but, as stated by said director, "It is probable that special legislation will be required to accomplish the purposes of the city authorities."

It is therefore evident that special legislation will be required to fully accomplish the purposes sought by the city. Upon the presentation of a bill for that purpose covering said land, steps will be taken looking to the withdrawal of the land by Executive order from all forms of disposal, pending such legislation.

Your inclosures are herewith returned.

Respectfully, FRANKLIN K. LANE.

The bill has been submitted by the committee to the Department of Agriculture, because the legislation thereof affects the land within the Wasatch National Forest, and the report from the Secretary of the department approving the legislation is also hereto appended.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, May 9, 1914.

Hon. HENRY L. MYERS,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands, United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: In further reply to your request for a report upon the bill (S. 4741) for the protection of the water supply of the city of Salt Lake City, Utah.

It is proposed in the bill that approximately 25,000 acres of Government land, nearly all within the Wasatch National Forest, be reserved from all forms of entry or appropriation and set aside as a municipal water-supply reserve for the use and benefit of the city of Salt Lake City. Section 2 of the bill proposes the manner in which the area shall be administered for the storage and conveyance of water for municipal purposes. Additional authority is given the Secretary of Agriculture in section 3 of the bill to prevent trespass, so as to preserve the purity of the water supply. All the legal rights of individuals heretofore acquired on the area are protected in section 4.

I inclose a map of the area showing graphically the national forest lands, State lands, municipal lands, and lands in private ownership, together with approximately one section of unreserved, unappropriated public land. From information of record in the Forest Service it appears that titles to these lands within the exterior boundaries of the proposed municipal water-supply reservation are held as follows:

	Acres.
National forest land	24,000
Unappropriated Government land	1,475
State land	2,040
City land	23,855
Railroad and private land	16,527

On the national forest areas there are some lode claims initiated under the mining laws, and there are several placer locations of quarries of smelter, building, and cement stone. Of the lode-mining claims none are being operated. The Emigration Stone Co. and the Portland Cement Co. of Utah are engaged in active operations at their quarries. The placer claims, covering the quarries of different kinds, amount to approximately 1,500 acres. Not more than a half dozen patents have been issued under the lode-mining laws within this area. It is assumed, however, that the Land Office will inform your committee more particularly in regard to the quantities and areas of alienations on the proposed reservation.

The cover of the area consists very largely of scrub oak and maple brush. The northern slope of City Creek Canyon had, however, at one time a good stand of timber. A good reproduction of this has sprung up since the watershed was protected. The south slope of City Creek Canyon is almost entirely oak brush. The next canyon in importance is Emigration, about half of the watershed there being covered with sagebrush and the other half with oak and maple brush. Parleys Canyon has about the same proportion; probably a little larger percentage is of oak and maple brush than of sagebrush. Lambs Fork, the main right fork of Parleys Canyon, has considerable good timber; however, this is largely in private ownership. The character of this land is steep and mountainous, ranging in elevation from 4,500 to 8,000 feet. None of the area is valuable for agriculture. Its chief value is for timber production and for municipal water-supply protection.

This department has always recognized the fact that one of the highest uses to which national forest land could be put is in the protection of water supplies needed for municipal purposes. In several instances cooperation between municipalities and the Forest Service has been arranged. Forms of cooperative agreement are now in force with many of these municipalities, among which are the city of Colorado Springs; the town of Manitou, Colo.; Portland, Oreg.; and Tacoma, Wash. Some of these agreements are entered into under the general authority of this department to cooperate with the municipalities and in other cases specific laws have been enacted by Congress to authorize agreements.

The wording of the bill now before me is quite similar to that used in the act establishing a reservation on the Pike National Forest for the city of Colorado Springs and the town of Manitou, approved February 27, 1913 (37 Stat., 685).

The plan outlined in the provisions of section 3 of that act, relating to the administration of the lands involved, has been found to be eminently practicable and satisfactory. It provides in part as follows:

"SEC. 3. That the lands heretofore described and reserved for municipal water-supply purposes shall be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture at the expense of and in cooperation with the city of Colorado Springs * * *."

Since the purpose of the present act is identical with this earlier enactment for the benefit of the city of Colorado Springs and the town of Manitou, and conditions are in no wise dissimilar, I respectfully suggest that the wording of the present act be slightly amended in order to conform thereto. The following substitute is offered for section 2 of the bill S. 4741:

"That the lands heretofore described and reserved for municipal water-supply purposes shall be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture at the expense of and in cooperation with the city of Salt Lake City, for the purpose of storing, conserving, and protecting from pollution the said water supply, and preserving, improving, and increasing the timber growth on said lands to more fully accomplish such purposes, and to that end said city shall have the right, subject to approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, to the use of any and all parts of the lands reserved, for the storage and conveying of water and construction and maintenance thereon of all improvements for such purposes."

If this amendment is adopted, this department has no objection to the passage of the bill.

Very truly, yours,

D. F. HOUSTON,
Secretary.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

Mr. BRYAN. From the Committee on Claims I report a resolution, for which I ask present consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 366) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That in compliance with the request of the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, pursuant to an order of the court, under date of May 13, 1914, the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, instructed to return to the Court of Claims the dismissal of the French spoliation case of the schooner Maria, Charles Taylor, master, Nos. 2555, 2630, 4365, 633, contained in House Document No. 379, Sixty-third Congress, second session, and the said court is hereby authorized to proceed in said case as if no return therein had been made to the Congress.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT OF COLOMBIA.

Mr. POMERENE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported the following resolution (S. Res. 367), which was read:

Resolved, That there be printed 500 copies each of parts 1 and 2, Senate Document No. 264, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session; Senate Document No. 123, Fifty-seventh Congress, second session; and Senate Document No. 199, Fifty-eighth Congress, second session, all relating to claims against the Government of Colombia, and stitched together in one pamphlet for the use of the Senate document room.

FORT M'HENRY MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House bill 12806, being Order of Business 460 on the calendar. My reason for making the request is that the bill has for its object the transferring to the city of Baltimore of the Fort McHenry Military Reservation, which is not used by the Government. It is not in the form of an absolute grant, but simply a permission to use it. The citizens of Baltimore are preparing to hold a celebration there on the 6th of September to honor not only the occasion of the battle fought there, but also the writing of the Star-Spangled Banner by Key. The bill is largely one of local interest, and it is in order to assist them in carrying out the purposes of the proposed celebration that I make this request.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, is the morning business closed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning business is not closed.

Mr. McCUMBER. I object to the consideration of any measure until the morning business is closed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made. If there are no further reports of committees, the introduction of bills and joint resolutions is in order.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

A bill (S. 5614) for the improvement of the foreign service; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

A bill (S. 5615) to provide for the inspection and grading of grain entering into interstate commerce, and to secure uniformity in standards and classification of grain, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

A bill (S. 5629) for the relief of certain persons who made entry under the provisions of section 6, act of May 29, 1908; to the Committee on Public Lands.

AMENDMENT TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. JOHNSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

ARBITRATION TREATIES.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, when the treaties with France and England negotiated by President Taft were under consideration, I made a somewhat careful examination of the records to see when the Senate had first committed itself to the principle of arbitration. At that time I did not find anything earlier than the Sherman resolution of 1890, which I placed in the speech I made on those treaties. To-day I have come across an earlier resolution—16 years earlier—which was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations by Mr. Hamlin, of Maine, on June 9, 1874. It is as follows:

Resolved, That the United States, having at heart the cause of peace everywhere, and hoping to help its permanent establishment between nations, hereby recommend the adoption of arbitration as a just and practical method for the determination of international differences, to be maintained sincerely and in good faith, so that war may cease to be regarded as a proper form of trial between nations.

This resolution was considered and agreed to without debate on the 23d of June, 1874. If there is no objection, I should like to have the Secretary order it reprinted, as I think this is the last copy. I also wish it to appear in what I have just said. It is interesting as showing that the Senate adopted the arbitration principle 40 years ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the request of the Senator from Massachusetts will be complied with.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, on the 21st of April, in speaking on the Mexican situation, I stated that Ambassador Wilson's recommendations for the recognition of the de facto Huerta government was in March last year. I was in error as to the time and I should like to correct it. I ask unanimous consent to have read and printed in the RECORD a letter from Mr. Wilson on that subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Michigan? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., May 11, 1914.

Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have just been shown a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 21 which contains a copy of the recommendations made by me to the President and afterwards read to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, with reference to the recognition of the present provisional government of Mexico. I detect no error in the wording of the recommendations. They were carefully considered at the time they were offered, and I think have been fully justified by events which have since occurred.

In the comments, however, which you had occasion to make at the time of submitting the recommendations you fell into the very natural error of assigning them chronologically to the month of March, 1913. I think it of some importance that it should be known that these recommendations were made to the President and afterwards read to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations in the month of August, 1913, while I was in Washington under instructions from the Secretary of State and prior to the acceptance of my resignation.

Inasmuch as some overzealous supporters of the President's policies toward Mexico have with unfortunate haste commented upon the recommendations of August as being the sole and only solution of the difficult situation proposed by me, I feel that I am justified in saying that the records of the Department of State show conclusively that in the early months of the present administration—either April or May, I think—I recommended the unconditional recognition of the Huerta administration. If this is denied, I shall know how to demonstrate the truth. I made the same recommendations with reference to recognition to the Wilson administration that I had made to the Taft administration in February, and I may say here, without fear of contradiction, that the Taft administration recognized the legality of the installation of the Huerta government and withheld formal recognition only because of the delay of the new Mexican administration in adjusting certain long pending differences.

When I made the recommendations for unconditional recognition of the Huerta administration in the early days of the present administration, my position was justified by every consideration of interest and humanity; the revolution against Madero had been generally accepted throughout the country, foreign Governments were rapidly according recognition, and the present revolutionary movement was a cloud no larger than a man's hand on the horizon. Prompt action by our Government, if taken then, would, in my judgment, have averted all the horrors, sacrifices, odiums, and dangers which followed. Four months later, when I made the recommendations, which you have placed upon the records of the Senate, the situation had entirely changed. Our policy toward this unfortunate country had become the subject of severe criticism in European chancelleries, had excited profound distrust in Latin America, had alienated the friendly sentiments of the Mexican Government, and inspired the hopes and rallied the spirits of those in rebellion against the Government.

I was therefore obliged to consider three things in making the recommendations, which you have placed upon the Senate records, viz:

First. The best method of restoring our national prestige.

Second. The best method of affording protection to our nationals in northern Mexico, without being forced to go to war.

Third. The best method of meeting what I understood to be the views and of conforming to the announced policies of the present administration.

To accomplish the restoration of our national prestige I recommended the severe conditions to be imposed before according recognition; to protect our nationals in northern Mexico I recommended an agreement with the Mexican Government to the effect that in case of necessity we should be permitted to go as far south as the twenty-sixth parallel with its consent—below the twenty-sixth parallel there was no semblance of a revolution; to meet the views and to conform to the policies of the present administration, I made the recommendation for demanding guarantees for a constitutional election. At the time I made this recommendation, I knew that a constitutional election could not be held in Mexico, but I also believed that it would be impossible to carry this fact home to the minds of those in charge of the foreign affairs of this Nation. I hoped that some satisfactory process might be gone through which would result in the selection of a good man for President, who, without having been elected by constitutional methods, might nevertheless govern in accordance with democratic principles and endeavor to lay foundations upon which an intelligent and instructed suffrage might be built up.

The recommendations which I made in the first instance I still believe should have been acted upon, and those which I had occasion to offer later, and which are the subject of this letter, I am sure every disinterested person must believe were conceived in a spirit of devotion to the interests of this Government.

Very sincerely, yours, HENRY LANE WILSON.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, this gentleman, who is a pretty well discredited ex-diplomat, sought opportunities to exploit himself through the public press, and availed himself of every opportunity presented until his fulminations became somewhat stale and the press ceased to be interested in him. I suppose he is endeavoring now to revive his drooping fortunes by "butting into" the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Missouri has departed from his usual sense of fairness in the rather hypercritical remarks he has just made about the former American ambassador. Surely the Senator from Missouri recognizes that during the many months—in fact, years—of his service in Mexico, Ambassador Wilson left no important duty unperformed. He stood at the head of the diplomatic corps during the siege and bombardment of the City of Mexico. He was courageous, careful, painstaking, and thorough in his protection of American life and property. He deserves and has received the praise of his countrymen for the services he rendered.

I can not permit this opportunity to pass without expressing my sincere regret that the honored Senator from Missouri should feel called upon to unkindly characterize the services of this faithful official.

Mr. STONE. I do not think, as my friend does, that Mr. Wilson is entitled to the grateful consideration of the American people for his services in Mexico. I think the secretary of that embassy, who, upon Mr. Wilson's somewhat enforced retirement, became the chargé d'affaires at that embassy, is deserving of great praise and the highest consideration for the performance of most delicate duties under circumstances of the greatest difficulty, and not unaccompanied with peril to himself. For myself I have very little consideration or respect for our former ambassador to the Republic of Mexico.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He was a source of embarrassment there.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, just a word in response to what the Senator says about the "enforced retirement." Of course, anyone at all familiar with the facts which the records of the State Department will disclose must know that Ambassador Wilson tendered his resignation several times, and separated himself from the service voluntarily. He was, however, kept in the service long after his desire to retire, because of the exigencies of the Mexican situation and the desire of this Government to avail itself of his valuable services. That is a matter of easy demonstration.

I think wherever there is any credit or honor due to the American Government in the Mexican situation, it ought to be distributed with fairness. I concur in all the Senator says about the service of Mr. O'Shaughnessy. He certainly performed his duty with credit to himself and to the Government he represented; but it is not easy to ignore the ample proof upon the records of the State Department of Mr. Wilson's fidelity to duty, for which he has received the highest praise at home and abroad for his service in Mexico up to the time when he voluntarily withdrew from the service.

SHIPPING TRADE IN THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, Mr. Joseph N. Teal, of Portland, Oreg., was a witness recently before the Interoceanic Canals Committee. I have a brief letter from this gentleman in which he supplements certain views he then conveyed to the committee regarding the condition of the shipping trade in the United States. It is so short I ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the reading of the letter? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

PORTLAND, OREG., May 12, 1914.

Hon. JAMES A. O'GORMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: It is possible the Panama debate may be closed before this letter reaches you, but in view of the fact at the hearings before the committee it seemed to be the opinion of some Senators that the "tramp" and the irregular steamers were unimportant factors both from traffic handled as well as effect on rates, I thought you might be interested in the findings of the Interstate Commerce Commission in a recent case passing on violations of the fourth section (long-and-short-haul clause) in the Southeast. This case is entitled "Fourth section violations in the Southeast," and will be found in 30 I. C. C., 153. It is a very exhaustive report on the water situation between Atlantic ports, including, of course, the Carolinas and Georgia and all of the Gulf States. Under the heading "Water transportations from New York to south Atlantic ports," at page 169, after setting out the regular lines operating, at page 170 the commission uses the following significant language:

"In addition to the freight carried by the regular steamship companies, large and important quantities of low-grade commodities move into and out of the south Atlantic ports by tramp steamers and steamers belonging to lumber companies moving loaded out of the south Atlantic ports and returning empty except for such traffic as can be obtained. Considerable tonnage is handled by sailing vessels. Cement, coal, fertilizer materials, etc., move to the south Atlantic ports in large quantities by these irregular steamships on lower rates than are afforded by the regular steamship lines. The service of these tramp steamers, lumber steamers, sailing vessels, etc., constitutes a check upon the rates of the regular steamship lines, compelling low rates from them, particularly as to all classes of low-grade traffic which can be handled to advantage by the irregular steamers and sailing service."

Dealing with conditions at the city of Savannah, on the same page, the commission says:

"During the year 1911 Savannah handled over 2,500,000 bales of cotton and, next to Galveston, Tex., is the largest cotton market in the world. During the same year 404 irregular vessels, consisting of schooners, barks, and steamships, not including any vessels of the Ocean Steamship Co. or of the Merchants & Miners Transportation Co., entered Savannah. Such of these vessels as moved to and from eastern ports handled fertilizer material, salt, cement, plaster, coal, iron and steel articles, brick, oil, gravel, and hay from north Atlantic ports to Savannah, and lumber and crossties from Savannah to the north Atlantic ports. The approximate amount of traffic carried by these irregular vessels, exclusive of foreign traffic from the north Atlantic ports to Savannah, was 130,172 tons, and during the same period 50,000,000 board feet of lumber and crossties were shipped from Savannah by these vessels. These outside vessels brought into Savannah 10,938 tons of cement at a rate of approximately 97 cents a ton, as compared with the rate of the regular steamship companies of $1.50. The approximate rates charged by these irregular vessels from north Atlantic ports to Savannah are:

	Per ton.
Fertilizer	$1.50
Salt	1.25
Iron and steel articles	1.70
Plaster	.97
Coal	1.10
Brick	1.09
Hay	.90

Under the head of Brunswick and Jacksonville, page 171, the report shows the arrival and clearances in the coastwise trade for 1911 were 3,492 vessels. "The lumber tonnage alone amounted to 223,786,999 board measure."

The foregoing findings of fact by the commission show that my statement to the committee to the effect that there was a large number of outside vessels not in any trust or combine engaged in the trade between the north Atlantic and south Atlantic ports and also that the tramp vessels control the rates on the heavy commodities was correct. It further shows, as I stated, that tramp steamers loaded with lumber moving north make very low rates to secure tonnage southbound. It is perfectly apparent to me that to secure the fullest benefit of the canal for this country the tramps and independent steamers must be encouraged and not discouraged in their operation, and it is equally apparent that a toll will favor the regular liner reasonably sure of cargo both ways and operate to the detriment of the tramp steamer, which must keep moving in order to make a living and can not lay very long in port at any time awaiting cargo.

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPH N. TEAL.

SIGNALS FOR VESSELS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5289) to provide for warning signals for vessels working on wrecks or engaged in dredging or other submarine work, which were, on page 2, lines 1 and 2, to strike out "marking a wreck or" and insert "dredges of all types and vessels working on wrecks by"; on page 2, line 11, after "ferryboats," to insert "barges, dredges, canal boats, vessels working on wrecks"; on page 2, line 13, after "vessels," to insert "barges, dredges, and boats," and to amend the title so as to read:

An act to provide for warning signals on vessels working on wrecks or engaged in dredging or other submarine work, and to amend section 2 of the act approved June 7, 1897, entitled "An act to adopt regulations for preventing collisions upon certain harbors, rivers, and inland waters of the United States."

Mr. PERKINS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there are no further concurrent or other resolutions the morning business is closed.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent for a few moments to present some figures in relation to the imports and exports of the United States for the month of April. It will not take more than a few moments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator from Utah will proceed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the tariff law has been in force now some six months, and it can now be judged as to what the future result of the workings of that bill will be as affecting our commerce.

I am in receipt of the report from the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, Department of Commerce, showing the total values of imports and exports of the United States for the month of April, 1914.

The question is often asked, What is the matter with business? I believe that this is a proper time to call the attention of the Senate and of the country to one of the great reasons for the unsettled and unsatisfactory state of business conditions in this country.

From the report it is shown that the merchandise exported for April aggregated a value of $162,368,852, as compared with $199,813,438 for the corresponding month of last year. This is a loss in exports of $37,444,586 in a single month.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator restate the figures?

Mr. SMOOT. The returns of the Department of Commerce show that the merchandise exports for April of this year amounted to $162,368,852, as compared with $199,813,438 for the corresponding month of last year under a protective tariff. This is, as I stated, a loss in exports of $37,444,586 in a single month.

The imports in April of this year were $172,640,724, as compared with $146,194,461 in April of last year, or a gain in imports for the month of $26,446,263. Taking the imports and exports together they show a total loss in money to the commerce of the United States of $63,890,849 in one month, or at the rate of $766,690,188 annually.

This, Mr. President, is the promised expansion of trade, and it shows the adverse balances against our country under the present tariff law. But it must be remembered that we are just beginning to experience the real effect of the Democratic law. It has not yet gone into effect to its full extent.

The duty on sugar was cut in March, but it will be some months yet before it takes full effect and thus wipe out the industry in this country. The imports exceeded exports in April by $10,271,872. Thus we are coming to a condition which has existed under former Democratic tariff laws, when distress everywhere prevailed. As I stated, these figures tell of that wonderful expansion of trade promised by our Democratic friends.

Mr. GALLINGER. Especially by Mr. Redfield.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, another thing I want to call attention to is the quantities of goods that are manufactured ready for consumption imported into this country, and the increases of that class of goods. I have not yet the figures for April. It will be impossible to get them until about the beginning of next month. But I have the figures for February and for March of this year, and they can be compared with the figures for February and March, 1913. The imports of merchandise ready for consumption in March, 1914, compared with the imports in the same months of 1913, I ask may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Imports of merchandise ready for consumption in March, 1914, showing increase compared with imports in the same month in 1913.

Total	29,218,670	16,994,865	12,223,805	71.9

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am going to call attention to a few of the increases. For instance, on manufactures of aluminum the increase is 176.4 per cent. The increases on cotton cloths are 94.2 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The importations?

Mr. SMOOT. The importations. The increase on other knit goods is 719.8 per cent; on tin plate, 694.6 per cent.

Mr President, I noticed in the press a day or two ago one shipment of tin plate of 12,000 cases landed in the port of New York. So when we get our May returns the increase will be greater than 694.6 per cent.

On leather and tanned skins there is an increase of 144.8 per cent; on woolen cloths, an increase of 324 per cent; on wearing apparel, an increase of only 3.2 per cent; on dress goods, an increase of 227 per cent; on all other manufactures of wool, an increase of 707 per cent. The total average increase of goods ready for consumption during the month of March this year over the month of March, 1913, is 71.9 per cent. Then people wonder why so many of our mills are closed. People are asking why so many of our laboring men are out of employment. These figures tell the story, Mr. President. Instead of our laboring men making our goods, they are made by foreigners and shipped into this country.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Has the Senator the figures of the Department of Commerce for the six months of the operation of the new tariff law?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not them with me.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Senator permit me to place in the RECORD the official figures?

Mr. SMOOT. I will be glad to have the Senator do that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In the report of the Secretary of the Department of Commerce just made he states the value of the finished manufactures imported in six months. According to this report, there was imported in six months under the new tariff, from October 1 to April 1, of finished manufactures, $228,000,000 against $215,000,000 in the same period last year, an increase of $13,000,000, which would represent a loss to American labor of more than $2,000,000 a month in wages.

The value of manufacturers' material imported in the first six months of the new Democratic tariff law is $469,000,000 against $517,000,000 last year. In other words, our labor worked with $50,000,000 less raw material during the last six months than last year.

The value of the manufactures exported in the first six months of the new tariff law decreased from $582,000,000 to $541,000,000, a loss in American trade of $41,000,000 in the last six months, or a little less than $8,000,000 a month to American labor.

These startling figures illustrate the unwisdom of recent tariff changes and call loudly for a reassertion of the historic policy of protection to American industry and labor.

Mr. SMOOT. Taking the month of April, there was imported $26,446,263 worth of goods more than a year ago. I say, if the manufactured goods only required 50 per cent of their value in labor, there was a loss to the United States during the month of April to the laboring men of this country of over $13,000,000 from increased importations alone.

Mr. President, not only do these figures show an increase of importations and a falling off of exportations, but we must remember also that there is a falling off in consumption in this country. People are not purchasing as much. That decrease also falls upon the mill men of this country. I notice that in the month of May——

Mr. LANE. I do not understand the deduction of the Senator. He states that there has been a large importation, but a much less use of the articles after they import them. What do they do with them? Do they pile them up?

Mr. SMOOT. No; they are not piled up. The foreign goods come in and our mills are prevented from making the goods. The increased amount of importations were formerly purchased from our local mills.

Mr. LANE. Then they are used after they come here?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly they are used.

Mr. LANE. I did not understand the Senator's statement.

Mr. SMOOT. These are importations, and every dollar of importations takes the place of a dollar's worth of goods manufactured in this country.

So far in the month of May, Mr. President, the same increase of importations has been repeated as in the month of April, for I notice that the receipts from customs for the month of April, 1913 and 1914, to the 17th of the month, notwithstanding the reduction in duties, amount to a little more this year than they did last year. It was freely admitted by Democrats that at the close of the fiscal year there would be from forty-five to fifty million dollars shortage in revenue from the collection of customs under the Democratic tariff law, but instead of there being at the end of this fiscal year a deficit of $50,000,000, I want to say to the Senate, there will not be a deficit of $30,000,000. So the tariff law has had the effect of increasing the imports even more than our Democratic friends contemplated that it would.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. KERN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. What is the order of business before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business has been closed, and the calender under Rule VIII is in order.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Panama Canal tolls bill be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. HOLLIS obtained the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. WALSH. The absence of my colleague [Mr. MYERS] is due to his illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, the Panama Canal, built, owned, and operated by the United States of America, constitutes the greatest public utility on earth.

The United States has dedicated that canal to the service of all mankind. She boasts that she holds it in trust for the peoples of the world. She throws wide its portals on easy terms to the commerce of all the nations. But by act of Congress, enacted August 24, 1912, she has exempted from payment of tolls vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States. And since no other ships than those owned by her citizens are permitted to engage in the coastwise trade of the United States, she has thereby discriminated against the general public in favor of a certain class of her own citizens.

We are now asked to repeal the act of August 24, 1912, so that the ships of all nations may pass through the canal "without discrimination and on terms of entire equality." I favor such repeal, and as my reasons differ in some respects from any that have been disclosed in this debate, I venture to express them to my colleagues.

Good men, wise men, patriotic men, disagree over the treaty obligations and economic policies involved in the pending question. It is not difficult to make a strong argument on either side. There have been masterly arguments on both sides in the Senate in the past few weeks.

To speak with entire frankness, Senators seem to choose sides as a matter of feeling, or a matter of taste, or a matter of party loyalty, and then to marshal facts and figures and precedents to buttress their preconceived notions. And they find the task easy and diverting.

I confess to a prejudice against any form of discrimination in matters of transportation. I have never ridden on a pass in my life. For 10 years I fought the granting of passes by the railroads of New Hampshire, until special privileges of that kind were abolished. During that fight I learned that if one man was carried free some one else had to pay for his transportation, and it worked out in the long run so that those who paid, and who were least able to pay, were charged not only for their own passage, but also for the passage of those who could best afford to pay and who were favored with free passes.

I therefore approach this problem with a healthy prejudice against any special privilege in matters of transportation. I am aware also that any foreign citizen in this country pays precisely the same rate for the transportation of his person and his property, by rail or by boat, that every American citizen pays. I know, further, that it is the enlightened policy of the age in transportation matters to serve all comers at reasonable rates and without discrimination. I happen, moreover, to be a radical along the lines of equal opportunity and in opposition to special privilege, so I am on the lookout for chances to extend rather than to restrict the doctrine.

And so when I learn that certain citizens of the United States have been exempted from the payment of tolls in transporting their ships through the Panama Canal I see the old problem arising under new conditions, and I have an instinctive feeling that here is the free-pass question again; that exemption of some from the payment of tolls will shift their burden to the shoulders of others, and that the shoulders on which that burden will ultimately rest will be the shoulders of the taxpayers.

I can easily demonstrate that all taxes are paid in the end by the ultimate consumer and that the great bulk of the ultimate consumers are the poor people of the land. And already are the burdens of the poor most grievous.

After frankly stating my prejudice against free passage of any sort, I think it is fair to say that that prejudice is more than overcome in my case by the plank in the Baltimore platform of 1912, pledging the Democratic Party in favor of tolls exemption at Panama. I freely admit that that plank should be sacredly regarded unless the exemption of American coastwise ships from tolls is contrary to our solemn treaty obligations. I assume that no one considers a platform declaration more binding than the provisions of a valid and existing treaty.

My argument, then, will be confined to the construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, concluded in 1901 between the United States and Great Britain. Those who favor repeal hold, as a rule, that this treaty forbids any discrimination in favor of our coastwise shipping; those who oppose repeal hold, as a rule, that this treaty does not forbid discrimination, so far as American ships are concerned.

As is usual in cases of disputed construction, both sides have drawn lavishly in this debate from contemporaneous history and from current opinion. I now venture to direct the attention of the Senate to what the parties probably intended in the light of the common-law principles regarding transportation matters current in both countries at the time the treaty was concluded, for it is improbable that either country would have demanded from the other anything that was manifestly unfair in the light of the best current thought on transportation matters, and it is equally improbable that either country would have made a concession not required by the same enlightened thought.

We may exclude at the outset any application of common-law principles to war vessels and war measures, for these matters are conceded to be settled by the treaty; at least, they are not in controversy at this time. We are dealing with that part of the question which concerns vessels of commerce alone.

Let us first clearly indicate the duties which the common law imposes upon all who undertake a public calling, particularly the public calling which involves transportation in all its branches—by stage coach, turnpike, toll bridge, ferry, steamboat, pipe line, tramway, railroad, or canal.

The distinction between a private calling and a public calling is not always easy to describe, but it has been determined that all persons or corporations who hold themselves out to transport the public or the goods of the public are clearly engaged in a public calling. All persons who are so engaged are obliged to serve everyone who applies on equal terms.

Of the innkeeper it has been said that "when the weary traveler reaches the wayside inn in the gathering dusk, if the host turns him away, what shall he do? Go to the next inn? It is miles away, and the roads are infested with robbers." And so it is for the public interest that the innkeeper be obliged to accept every guest upon equal terms so long as he has accommodations.

The application of these principles to everyone who serves the traveling public, or the shipper of goods, was natural and inevitable, but the principles applicable to public callings have been carried much further.

In the leading case of Munn v. Illinois (94 U. S., 113), it was held that a grain elevator was a public business, obliged to serve all comers at reasonable rates, without discrimination, although the elevator stood upon land purchased by private treaty, although it had no privileges in the public streets, although it had no aid from the public treasury, and was not even incorporated. Justice Waite, of the United States Supreme Court, said in his opinion:

> This brings us to inquire as to the principles upon which this power of regulation rests, in order that we may determine what is within and what without its operative effect. Looking, then, to the common law, from whence came the right which the Constitution protects, we find that when private property is "affected with a public interest, it ceases to be juris privati only." This was said by Lord Chief Justice Hale more than 200 years ago in his treatise De Portibus Maris, and has been accepted without objection as an essential element in the law of property ever since. Property does become clothed with a public interest when used in a manner to make it of public consequence, and affect the community at large. When, therefore, one devotes his property to a use in which the public has an interest, he, in effect, grants to the public an interest in that use, and must submit to be controlled by the public for the common good to the extent of the interest he has thus created. He may withdraw his grant by discontinuing the use; but so long as he maintains the use, he must submit to the control.

In Nash v. Page (80 Ky., 531) tobacco warehouses were held to have a monopoly of the business, and hence to have undertaken a public calling, subject to the obligation to treat all comers alike.

In Inter Ocean Publishing Co. v. Associated Press (184 Ill., 438) the great news-gathering service of the country was held public, and discrimination was forbidden in these words:

> It has devoted its property to a public use, and has, in effect, granted to the public such an interest in its use that it must submit to be controlled by the public for the common good, to the extent of the interest it has thus created in the public in its private property.

And the same was held of the ticker service for stock quotations upon the ground of monopoly. Shepard v. Gold Stock & Telegraph Co. (38 Hun, 338).

So for many years it has been established, under the common law of this country and of England by the highest courts, that when a person or a corporation devotes his property to a use in which the public has an interest he thereby grants to the public an interest in that use and must submit to those common-law principles which exact reasonable rates and equal treatment to all comers, without discrimination. This doctrine is clearly laid down in the case of Munn against Illinois, already quoted, and it is a principle which stands above all others in our constitutional law.

As is said in Tift v. Southern Railway (138 Fed., 753), decided in 1905:

> "The administration of justice," said Webster, "is the chiefest concern of man upon earth." Within the scope of that function of government there is, perhaps, no single topic of greater magnitude or moment than controversies which arise in trade and commerce. Said Sir Walter Raleigh, "Whosoever commands the trade of the world commands the riches of the world, and consequently the world itself." In a material sense, and in our astonishing civilization, nothing is more important than the transportation of commodities sold or interchanged, and in transportation the stability and reasonable character of the rates charged therefor is scarcely less important than transportation itself. The three grand departments of government—legislative, executive, and judicial—are with steady and swerveless purpose enacting or enforcing laws to safeguard the rights of the general public, and as well that portion engaged in the business of transportation.

The query naturally arises as to the underlying reason why a person engaging in a public service should be subjected to obligations which guarantee equality, and the usual answer is that the obligations are imposed in exchange for the right of eminent domain, or, in other words, the right to take private property for a public use. But it is clear that the right of eminent domain follows and does not precede the obligations of public service.

A railway company or a canal may be granted the right of eminent domain only because it is the present or prospective servant of the public. And this is for the reason that private property can not be taken from its owners by eminent domain except for public use.

Another reason, which is sometimes given for the rule stated, is that the common carrier has received aid through taxation; but here again the effect is mistaken for the cause. Public taxation in aid of a project is only permissible when that project is intended for a public use. The right of taxation therefore follows and does not precede the obligation to treat all comers alike.

In Loan Association v. Topeka (20 Wall. (U. S.), 655, 658, Mr. Justice Miller says:

> It was said that roads, canals, bridges, navigable streams, and all other highways had in all times been matter of public concern; that such channels of travel and of the carrying business had always been established, improved, regulated by the State, and that the railroad had not lost this character because constructed by individual enterprise, aggregated into a corporation. We are not prepared to say that the latter view of it is not the true one, especially as there are other characteristics of a public nature conferred on these corporations, such as the power to obtain right of way, their subjection to the laws which govern common carriers, and the like, which seem to justify the proposition.

From the study of the cases it is clearly evident that the real basis for casting upon public servants the obligation of equal treatment to all comers rests in the establishment of a monopoly, more or less complete. When it is evident that a situation has arisen where there is but one place to which the customer may apply for reasonable service, then the application of equality and the prohibition of discrimination attach. And the cases show that these obligations attach with inexorable force when the business has been established by the grant of an exclusive franchise.

If, then, a citizen of the United States, or of any other country, be it Russia, Japan, or Brazil, can show that a person or corporation has attained an exclusive franchise for the transportation of passengers and freight, he can enforce in the courts of this country his undoubted common-law right to have his person or his property transported at the same rates which are granted to others. No one will deny this right.

Nor will it be denied that citizens of all nations are entitled to exercise other public rights in the United States or any of its possessions. Any citizen from any land may ride upon our railroads or travel our highways, cross our toll bridges, avail himself of our water, gas, or electric service, use our sewers, or exercise any similar public right on the same terms as any citizen of the United States. And we, in common justice, must admit that citizens of the United States are accorded the same privileges in substantially every civilized quarter of the globe, and particularly in Great Britain and her dependencies.

At this point I beg the Senate to take note of a few definite facts at the time the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was concluded in 1901. The common-law principles we have been tracing were in force upon every railroad and canal in Great Britain and in the United States; the vessels of both nations were using the Welland Canal, on English soil, without discrimination and on equal terms; the vessels of both nations were using the Soo Canal, on American soil, without discrimination; the vessels of both nations were using the Suez Canal, on the soil of neither, in common with all other nations, without discrimination; the person and goods of any Englishman were being transported over every railroad and canal in America on equal terms with those of any American; the person and goods of any American were being transported over every railroad and canal in England on equal terms with those of any Englishman. The common law under which these privileges were enjoyed was the common inheritance of the two great Anglo-Saxon nations; it was the crystallized common sense, fairness, and justice of the two peoples.

What, then, would be expected by either of them if they should enter into a treaty which was to bestow on one of them an exclusive franchise to establish a transportation monopoly across the Isthmus of Panama? Would not the nation granting that monopoly naturally expect to require from the recipient of that monopoly franchise at least the same privileges and obligations imposed by both Governments on all railroads and canals within their borders? And why not?

Let us make no mistake about this. Let us fix firmly in our minds that every carrier by rail and water in the United States and in England is bound by the immutable principles of the common law under which both nations live, to carry all comers at reasonable rates, on equal terms, and without discrimination. And let us further remember that both nations enforce these obligations of entire equality and fair treatment in favor of prince and pauper, individual and corporation, citizen and foreigner, without discrimination or favor.

I hold it to be too plain for argument that that Nation to which we proudly give our allegiance would expect voluntarily to bind herself to observe those principles of justice and equality which she imposes upon others through her courts of justice.

It is true that there is no court in which these common-law obligations may be enforced, for the United States recognizes no higher power than herself, and there is therefore no authority to compel her obedience to the commonest decencies of international obligations. Even her treaties may be disregarded if she is deaf to the obligations of civilized mankind. But I know that every Senator of the United States, if he can discover and correctly apply the principles of justice and equality upon which our common-law obligations rest, will be zealous to have those principles observed by his country as well as by the humblest person, native or foreign.

But, strictly speaking, the question is not at this juncture what we ought to be willing to do, but what, in the light of the best current thought, we intended by the language we used in the treaty of 1901.

Is it, then, probable that the United States, in coming to an agreement with her neighbor, would voluntarily submit to the same common-law principles of equality and justice which she imposed through her highest courts upon her own citizens and the citizens of other lands? Or is it more probable that, because there is no sanction upon this planet for enforcing justice against her, she intended to stand above those principles of justice and equality which she demands from others and from her own citizens?

We have all observed that the application of morals and ethics ordinarily tends to grow more obscure as it becomes less personal. An upright citizen, who would scorn to take a mean advantage for his private purse, will perform acts which result in unjust enrichment to the corporation which he serves. An upright lawyer, who would not enforce his strict legal rights to the detriment of his neighbor, feels obliged to follow the instructions of his client in a case involving the same situation. Similarly, men will vote for national policies which they would be ashamed to invoke for their own private advantage. They seem to feel that there is a certain patriotism in overreaching for the benefit of their country, when a similar action for their own benefit would be described by a very different word.

I bespeak for the national honor, for the national interest, for the national benefit, the same application of common-law principles as our Nation enforces upon its own citizens and others within its borders—this and nothing more.

I do not feel it my duty as a Senator of the United States to assume that my country was any more grasping, any more selfish, any less just at the time the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made than I should have been myself if I had been making a contract in behalf of a railroad corporation. I hope that no one else will have the bad taste, in a mistaken burst of patriotism, to invoke a less lively appreciation of what is fair and just.

Urging once more that we keep in mind the undisputed principles of the American and English common law, let us see what matter it was about which the two nations were about to treat in 1900 and 1901.

We are impressed at the outset with the glaring fact that the United States was about to establish a monopoly at Panama, and to do so through an exclusive franchise to be obtained by the common consent of the nations of the earth. Every schoolboy seeking to distract his mind from the hard facts of his geography lesson had drawn a lead-pencil canal through Panama on the map of the Western Hemisphere. Every nation which had any commerce had looked forward to the day when it might send its wares through the Panama Canal and avoid the dangers and the distance of a voyage around Cape Horn.

It was very plain that there would never be more than one canal across the Isthmus. In the first place, the construction of a second canal would be an unpardonable waste of time and money. In the second place, a single canal might be widened and deepened so as to serve all commerce which would ever offer itself for passage. The construction of the Panama Canal would establish a complete monopoly of traffic at or near that point. This could not be denied.

We come next to the character of the franchise to be enjoyed by the United States. It will be conceded that the United States had no exclusive or peculiar right to occupy the Isthmus of Panama when negotiations began among nations for the first canal treaties. It was unthinkable that the United States would permit any other nation to go there and construct a canal without a plain understanding as to the use of the canal by ships of the United States. No other nation engaged extensively in commerce would permit the United States to build a canal for the exclusive use of its own ships. To establish a monopoly for the sole use of United States ships would be a cause of war, promptly crushed by a combination of the world powers. But the United States made no claim to such right. As long ago as 1850 it had entered into a treaty with Great Britain on the subject, and through treaty and convention and international agreement and by universal consent among the nations, the United States was to obtain in 1900 an exclusive franchise to build and maintain the Panama Canal.

At this point I am not debating the rights acquired under the various treaties which have been so much discussed. I am merely calling attention to the fact that, through the assent of the civilized world, the United States was in 1901 about to obtain an exclusive franchise to maintain a canal monopoly across the Isthmus of Panama. And it would necessarily follow, under any fair application of the common-law principles to which I have already alluded, that the United States would expect voluntarily to assume the duties and obligations of a common carrier, and therefore would expect to treat all comers on equal terms, without discrimination.

At this point let us test the soundness of the rule of equality as applied to railroads, canals, and the like. Let us assume that it were possible for one man to possess himself of all the water fit for drinking purposes in the United States. The owner would be compelled to furnish water to all who applied on reasonable terms, and it is inconceivable that he would be permitted to sell to one person for half the price charged to others.

Or assume that one of the United States were divided by a range of mountains, passable through a single narrow canyon, with room for but one wagon track or railroad. Would any person or corporation be permitted to occupy the pass and to carry his friends at one rate and other citizens at a higher rate? And, in the same way and along the same lines of reasoning, was it fair or equitable or decent for one nation to possess itself of the Isthmus of Panama and undertake to discriminate between its own citizens and others, particularly when it prohibits railroads and canals within its borders from discriminating against anyone?

That the principles for which I am contending have been recognized with remarkable unanimity by American statesmen and officials in connection with the Isthmian canal project may be easily shown. Suffice it to say here that they were so recognized in public statements and documents by Henry Clay, then Secretary of State, in 1826; by a Senate resolution in 1835; by a resolution of the House of Representatives in 1839; in a treaty by the United States with New Granada in 1846; in President Polk's message to the Senate in 1847; by Lewis Cass, Secretary of State, in 1858; and by James G. Blaine, Secretary of State, in 1881. These documents and statements are admirably set forth in a pamphlet on Exemption from Panama Tolls, lately published by Prof. Eugene Wambaugh, of Harvard University.

A right understanding of our official utterances and of the common-law principles, which I have emphasized to an extent which is, I fear, unpardonable, leads inevitably to the conclusion that any two Anglo-Saxons would have them clearly in mind when about to make a contract concerning any transportation service; and such an understanding leads equally to the conclusion that any two Anglo-Saxon nations would have them clearly in mind when about to treat concerning a canal from one ocean to another which both nations would expect to use.

Knowing well that it is a fundamental law of common carriers that they must carry all who apply, on reasonable terms and without discrimination, both nations would realize that any treaty provisions in conflict with this fundamental law, common to both, must be so clearly expressed that there could be no doubt of their meaning. In other words, there would be a presumption that each nation intended to conform to the well-established rules of conduct applicable to the subject matter, unless that presumption should be unmistakably rebutted by words of the clearest import. The burden of proof would be on the party claiming a construction opposed to the settled principles involved in transportation by rail or water.

Unless, then, the words of the treaty of 1901 clearly and unmistakably import discrimination in favor of American ships, and the right to impose upon British vessels rates higher than those charged American ships, we must conclude that equality of rates was intended and discrimination prohibited.

We are now prepared to examine the documents in the case, approaching them in the light which encompassed the high contracting parties when their minds met in 1901.

There are only five treaties to be considered from first to last, and they may be briefly described as follows:

1. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty between the United States and Great Britain, April 19, 1850.

2. The first Hay-Pauncefote treaty between the United States and Great Britain, exchanged February 5, 1900, but never ratified.

3. The second Hay-Pauncefote treaty, entered into November 18, 1901, and ratified December 16, 1901.

4. The Hay-Herran treaty with Colombia, January 22, 1903.

5. The Hay-Bunau-Varilla treaty with Panama, November 18, 1903.

The treaties with Colombia and Panama may be dismissed with the single comment that they give to the United States the undoubted right to build the canal across the Isthmus of Panama, and to operate and maintain it "in conformity with all the stipulations of the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901." (Hay-Herran treaty, art. 16; Hay-Bunau-Varilla treaty, art. 18.)

Passing, then, to the discussion of the treaties with Great Britain, we find that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty purported to fix by a convention the views and intentions of the United States and Great Britain concerning the construction of a Nicaragua canal. The two Governments made various agreements regarding any attempt to gain an advantage in any part of Central America; but the principal agreements were three in number, as follows: First, that neither nation would ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over such canal; second, that neither nation would ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the canal or in its vicinity; third, that neither nation would take advantage of any connection with any State or Government through whose territory the canal might pass "for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one, any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which should not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other." (Art. I.)

Here at the outset was a plain recognition of the common-law principles which must necessarily attach to a canal monopoly such as was contemplated. No one would suppose that such a treaty would be necessary among civilized nations inheriting common-law principles founded upon equity and justice. But it is most satisfactory to find these principles clearly recognized at the beginning of the negotiations.

In Article VI the purpose of both nations is plainly stated to be that—> of more effectually carrying out the great design of this convention, namely, that of constructing and maintaining the said canal as a ship communication between the two oceans for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all, and of protecting the same.

This is a noble and lofty purpose; and any citizen of the United States may congratulate himself that this "great design" was clearly stated at the outset, so that the whole world might understand the purpose of this country to serve mankind "on equal terms to all." Such was the intention of our country in 1850, and no one has suggested any reason why mankind in general should be treated in 1901 or in our day upon a less liberal and less enlightened scale. It may be claimed that one nation or another has at some time so conducted itself that we may be excused for making reprisal at this time. But surely nothing has occurred by which all mankind has forfeited its inherent right to equality of treatment.

In Article VIII it is stated that—> the Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the inter-oceanic communications * * * by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama.

And Article VIII proceeds to state that—> it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

We may well look back with pride to the high sense of national obligation so clearly recognized in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. We have not, after all, made such tremendous advances in the past 60 years in our enlightened conception of what a common carrier owes the public. The spirit of justice and equality for which I have been contending breathes from one end of the document to the other. We find there the clearest recognition of the obligation of the canal builder, whoever it might be, to serve all comers at reasonable rates on terms of entire equality and without discrimination.

Some zealous patriots have seen fit to call the Clayton-Bulwer treaty an "egregious blunder." But, blunder or not, it was a binding treaty until it was superseded by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901, and when properly viewed in the light of common-law principles, it is a clear and statesmanlike recognition of what Anglo-Saxons at that time believed just and fair in matters of transportation.

We have, then, paving the way—or, to use a better figure, lighting the path—for the treaty of 1901 an express declaration of the common-law principles to which every international carrier should be subjected. I maintain that these far-shining principles of equality and fair dealing needed no declaration by treaty, convention, or international agreement to constitute them beacon lights along the path of progress pursued by the two enlightened nations whose minds met in the treaty of 1850 and again in the treaty of 1901.

But it is indeed a satisfaction to know that these red lights were entowered in 1850, and were not removed or bedimmed in the next 50 years at least. We approach the negotiations of 1900 and 1901, accordingly, in the steady light of their illumination, by which all may read that up to then it was the common understanding of the United States and Great Britain that any canal across the narrows of the American Continent should be open on equal terms to their citizens and subjects, without discrimination, and that all other nations might avail themselves of the same terms by undertaking equal responsibilities.

In order fully to realize the reasons which induced the United States and Great Britain to supersede the Clayton-Bulwer treaty we must bear in mind that with the end of the nineteenth century there came to the United States enlarged responsibilities, among them the acquisition of the Philippine Islands, together with a sense of growing power among the nations of the earth, and a consciousness of possible trouble with the peoples of the East which might require the speedy transport of our fleet to the Pacific coast, and that the steady pressure of Great Britain's commerce and the care of her eastern dependencies made an early construction of the Panama Canal most desirable. It was evident that none but the Government of the United States would undertake the task.

But the Clayton-Bulwer treaty stood in the way. We had entered into that convention before we had embarked upon a policy of imperialism, and we had bound ourselves not to build the canal ourselves. We found it very inconvenient to be bound not to fortify the canal, not to exclude from it the ships of our enemy in time of war, not to fix the rate of tolls, not to control the canal and protect it by our own forces. And so we asked England, respectfully enough, to be so good as to release us from our treaty of 50 years' standing.

And England, in 1901, agreed to supersede the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and to make a new one, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. In point of fact, England receded from nearly every point of vantage under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The United States was left free to acquire as much territory as she desired, to build the canal herself, to fortify and control it, to fix the tolls, to exclude her enemies' ships in time of war, and to treat the canal as her private property—just like any other corporation owning a public utility.

In return for all these concessions England received but two promises: First, that there should be no discrimination in tolls; second, that the canal must be open to the ships of war of all nations in war or in peace, except that the United States might exclude the ships of her enemy in time of war. It hardly seems probable that Great Britain intended to yield the right to equality of tolls between English and American ships. She had already yielded four-fifths of her rights without an adequate consideration. Why should she yield the remaining fifth for no return? This line of argument readily suggests itself, but it is comparatively unimportant. Most important it is to examine closely the language of the treaty of 1901 to see whether its terms are so clear and definite against equality and for discrimination as necessarily to preclude the rights of entire equality which would ordinarily be presumed.

Proceeding, then, to a careful examination of the language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, we find in the preamble the clearly expressed desire to facilitate the construction of the canal "without impairing the 'general principle' of neutralization" established in Article VIII of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Article VIII says nothing of war, as might be indicated by the term "neutralization," but expresses the "general principle" of equality to all nations in the use of any canal at Nicaragua, Tehuantepec, or Panama. Instead of clear language favoring discrimination and inequality, here is an express declaration of the intention, and a recognition of the duty, to preserve equality of use to all nations.

The regulation of the canal is provided for in Article II of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and here, again, instead of an explicit prohibition of equality, it is clearly stated that the basis of neutralization adopted is that provided for the navigation of the Suez Canal, where equal rates are guaranteed.

The first rule of Article III provides for vessels of commerce and of war of all nations; the other five rules apply only to vessels of war or to acts of war. It has been argued that because the last five rules apply to vessels of other nations, it must follow that the first rule applies to vessels of other nations, not to vessels of the United States; but it is readily seen that there is nothing in this argument, for the first rule stands clearly by itself in dealing with vessels of commerce as well as with vessels of war. And since this is the only place where vessels of commerce are mentioned in this treaty, they receive the treatment accorded by the words of this article, and none other.

Here, if at all, we should expect those unequivocal and necessary words in derogation of the common-law principles of equality, but once again we are left suspended in mid-air, for these words are clear, it is true, but clear in support of, not in opposition to, the red lights of equality and fair dealing:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

It is conceded that these words, standing by themselves, clearly prohibit any discrimination in favor of vessels engaged in the American coastwise trade. For my part I am willing to concede that a strong argument is made in favor of the right to discriminate by bringing to bear other parts of the treaty and the surrounding circumstances. But when we recall the recognized principles of the common law which create a presumption in favor of equality and against discrimination, we clearly see that there is entirely lacking that clear and convincing statement which is required to overcome that presumption.

Not only are clear and convincing terms lacking to overcome the presumption of the common-law principles, but, on the contrary, the terms employed show clearly that the first rule of Article III is a mere reenactment of the obligations which attach to all public undertakings. Every element is there; the canal is open to all comers without exception, on equal terms, and without discrimination, and the charges must be reasonable. Instead of clear terms to set aside the common law we have throughout a second declaration of the recognized principles of the common law.

As eminent a lawyer as Mr. Richard Olney says that the obligations of a common carrier do not fit this case because—> the principle affects only the users of the public work and only prescribes entire equality as between them—it in no way prevents the owner of the work, or those for whom it holds the work in trust, from using it in any way and to any extent that the legal or beneficial owner or owners may determine. (Address before American Society of International Law, Apr. 25, 1913.)

But if it is conceded that "the principle affects only the users of the public work," our point is made. For the "users" are the public—Americans, English, Russians, and citizens of every nation—and for all such "users" entire equality is prescribed. The "owner" is the United States, and its Government vessels may be passed through the canal, everyone concedes, without charge, just as a railroad carries its own goods without payment of freight.

But when Mr. Olney says that "those for whom it holds the work in trust" may pass free, he falls into a plain error. A railroad holds its property in trust for its stockholders, but they can not be carried free, except to annual meetings or something of that sort. Because a man has bought a share of Pennsylvania Railroad stock he is not entitled to be carried free from here to Philadelphia.

Who are the beneficiaries for whom the United States holds the Panama Canal "in trust"? Surely not the owners of domestic ships. They have no more right to have their ships passed free than the owners of American ships engaged in foreign trade. If the Panama Canal is held in trust for any Americans, it is for all Americans, because all have been taxed for its construction. But no one contends that a man has a right to have his goods passed through the canal without charge because he is an American citizen.

The law is that a State or a nation, when it holds a public work in trust, holds it in trust for "the public," including all who come, foreign or domestic. Such is the law in New Hampshire, and in Mr. Olney's State of Massachusetts, regarding "great ponds," which are held in trust by the State for the use of "the public." (Concord v. Robertson, 66 N. H., 1; Watuppa v. Fall River, 147 Mass., 548.)

The authority cited by Mr. Olney to sustain his proposition (the Avon, 18 Int. Rev. Record, 165; III Moore, 268) goes merely to the point that "the nation which constructs an artificial channel may annex such conditions to its use as it pleases," falls short of saying that it may annex one condition for one country and another condition for another country. In the light of American and English common law, whatever conditions it annexes must apply to all on equal terms. Particularly must this be so when the canal occupies the only available place, establishes a monopoly, and is built under an exclusive franchise.

Rightly understood, the case of the Avon, supra, is an authority for my contention. It arose out of a collision in the Welland Canal between an American ship and a Canadian ship, in which the Canadian ship was at fault. Under the admiralty law of the United States the owner of the American vessel became the owner of a proprietary interest in the Canadian vessel, which would last until the damages suffered should be paid. The Canadian ship went into the hands of a new owner for value and without notice of the claim for damages. Subsequently the ship was seized in an American port by the American owner to answer for the damages inflicted. The case turned on the question what law should be applied. Under the Canadian law in force over the situs of the Welland Canal, the ship could not be held; under the general law of American admiralty it could be held.

Bear in mind that the Welland Canal is entirely artificial and constructed entirely on Canadian soil.

It was held, however, by the United States District Court that the general admiralty law prevailed just as much as if the collision had occurred on the high seas.

It thus appears that the Panama Canal, even though it is built on American soil by American money and is operated under American control, will be held for maritime purposes to be subject to the admiralty jurisdiction of the high seas.

Mr. Olney and Senator LODGE construct another argument on the proposition that the citizens of other nations are our "customers" in the use of the canal. They say:

> It can not reasonably be argued that in fixing terms for the use of its canal by customers the United States looked upon itself as one of the customers.

This is very true; the United States does not look upon itself as one of its own customers. It stands like a railroad company, and no one questions its right to pass free its Government vessels—ships of war, transports, revenue cutters, and the like—just as a railroad carries free its own freight and employees.

But when we come to the case of citizens of the United States as opposed to the Government of the United States, the railroad analogy holds. Citizens of the United States are "customers," just as foreign governments and foreign citizens are "customers," and just as stockholders of a railroad company are "customers." I still maintain that the United States has no more right to pass free through the canal ships belonging to its citizens than a railroad has to carry free the persons or property of its stockholders.

In 1912 the Congress of the United States passed a law exempting some of the Nation's "customers" from the payment of tolls. These "customers" are the owners of domestic coastwise ships. We have seen that such exemption was clearly contrary to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and to the common-law obligations of the United States as the owner of the canal. The passage of the exemption law did not make the exemption an act of justice. Quite the contrary. It merely placed upon the statute books an unjust law; nay, more, an invalid law, contrary to our treaty obligations. That injustice it is now our right and our privilege to correct. We are about to repeal an unjust and an invalid law.

It does not appeal to my sense of fair play to refer the validity of this law to the courts of either of the high contracting parties. Imagine the storm of disapproval if England should propose to test the law in its courts.

It seems to me so plain that I need no court to warrant me in declaring it invalid. The majority of the Senators of the United States can safely be trusted to pass upon it fairly and intelligently. They can repeal it more effectively and more speedily than any court of law.

Referring once more to the declaration of the Democratic platform of 1912 in favor of exemption from tolls, it is clear that no plank in a party platform could make a wrong thing right, any more than could the passage of the exemption act by Congress in August, 1912. No one is bound by a party platform to persist in an immoral or illegal act. I can, moreover, truthfully say that nothing was made of this plank in the State of New Hampshire, and I do not believe that a single Democratic vote was cast on the strength of it. It was a legal mistake to include it in the platform. Good faith and the honor of a great Nation require that it be disregarded.

In his learned speech of May 12 Senator SMOOT, of Utah, was pleased to say that the position taken by the Democratic administration in this matter is—> not worthy of the sons of the patriot fathers of the Revolution, who won for us by blood and sacrifice the blessings of liberty.

New Hampshire sends her compliments to the distinguished Senator from the great State of Utah. She is glad of his zeal and she glories in his patriotism. But she ventures to remind him that her sons fought the battles of the Revolution when his own State was a howling wilderness. She needs no lessons in brave deeds nor in patriotism. She was not afraid of England then; she is not afraid of England now.

New Hampshire bids me ask, Mr. President, how much her sons feared England in 1775, when they wrested from the British soldiers royal guns and ammunition in Fort William and Mary at Portsmouth and made the first armed resistance to King George, four months before the battle of Concord and Lexington and six months before the Battle of Bunker Hill? Was New Hampshire afraid of England when she built the Ranger in Portsmouth Harbor and sent her sailors over the broad Atlantic under John Paul Jones to capture a British man-of-war and receive the first salute ever given the Stars and Stripes by a foreign nation? How greatly did New Hampshire men shrink from their duty when her soldiers made up more than half the American troops at Bunker Hill and more than two-thirds of all the forces who won the Battle of Bennington under her own Gen. Stark? How much fear did the British see in the right wing of the advance guard at Trenton, when New Hampshire troops bore down upon them, led once more by Gen. Stark, under the command of Gen. Sullivan?

New Hampshire is not afraid of England; the United States is not afraid of England.

But there are things, Mr. President, of which my native State and my native country are very much afraid. They are afraid of yielding something of that jealous honor which befits one Christian gentleman when he deals with another; they are afraid to pose in the face of international opinion as a bully, who will grab a prize and hold it because he has the brute strength; they are afraid to submit to the judgment of the world the acute subtleties of a lawyer's argument in place of fulfilling their obligations. They are very much afraid, Mr. President, that the tradition of uprightness and good faith, received from their Revolutionary ancestors, may be transmitted to their descendants with an unworthy stain upon it; they are afraid to refuse to their neighbors the same principles of justice and equality which they impose upon all within their borders; they are afraid, Mr. President, that some other nation may outdo them in dealing thus with their neighbors and rob them of the privilege of being the first to establish the living reality of the Golden Rule among nations.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). Before the Senator from Iowa proceeds, the Chair will suggest, on his own motion, the absence of a quorum.

Mr. KENYON. I wish the Chair would not do that. I was going to suggest to Senators who wish to retire that at the close of my remarks I will guard them by calling for a quorum, so that they can be present for any business which is to be transacted. I wish the Chair would not have the roll called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that he has taken a step from which the rules do not permit him to recede. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Shields
Brandegee	Hitchcock	Norris	Shively
Bristow	Hollis	O'Gorman	Smith, Ariz.
Bryan	Hughes	Page	Smoot
Burleigh	James	Perkins	Stone
Burton	Johnson	Pittman	Sutherland
Catron	Kenyon	Poindexter	Thompson
Chamberlain	Kern	Pomerene	Tillman
Chilton	La Follette	Ransdell	Vardaman
Clark, Wyo.	Lane	Robinson	Walsh
Crawford	Lea, Tenn.	Saulsbury	Warren
Cummins	Lodge	Shafroth	West
Fall	Martin, Va.	Sheppard	Works

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HITCHCOCK in the chair). Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I have listened very patiently to all the speeches made on this subject, save one, and I can contribute nothing new to this discussion. I am not going to spend very much time, Mr. President, on what I have to say.

I have this advantage over some of our Democratic friends at this time, that we are not compelled to enter into any defense of platforms or the failure to keep platform pledges.

In fact, our Democratic friends should not be seriously criticized for their failure to keep a platform pledge, because, if the figures submitted to-day by the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] are correct, it would be well if they had broken another one of their party pledges. I am not, however, concerned with that. I want to say a few words in explanation of my vote, and really shall say these words for the benefit of the people at home whom I represent in this body, but if any Senator should wander in, believing that the agricultural bill is before the Senate, of course I shall be pleased to have him listen to me. I desire the home folks to know my reasons for voting as I shall.

I know, Mr. President, that anyone who shall vote here for the repeal of the Panama Canal tolls act will be charged with being a railroad Senator and anyone who votes against repeal will be charged with being a coastwise-monopoly Senator. I have ceased to care what I am charged with being, so long as I am satisfied in my own mind that my position is the result of honest conviction.

Mr. President, anyone who asserts there is but one side to the Panama-toll question and that the construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is easy, evidences an arrogance of mind and a paucity of intellectual fairness. The questions involved relative to the construction of the treaty are what lawyers would call close questions, and very difficult of determination.

The attitude of a large portion of our American people on this subject is a great tribute to their honesty. From all over the Nation have come demands that the clause in the Panama act exempting coastwise vessels from toll be repealed. The mere charge or suggestion that we have violated treaty obligation has been enough in many instances, without any proof being furnished, to lead the American citizens to the demand that we keep our pledges. As a people we are honest; if we have made contracts we believe in keeping them. There is little sound judgment, however, in surrendering rights honestly acquired merely because the charge is made that to maintain those rights would be a breach of treaty or contract obligation.

Members of Congress, as was so well pointed out by the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] a couple of days ago, are merely trustees. It is not in their power, if conscientious in the performance of their duties, to surrender the rights of those they represent if they believe the particular thing involved is a right or that there is a fair question of doubt with reference thereto.

While a canal across the Isthmus has been the subject of discussion for many years, the absolute necessity therefor had not become a fixed conviction with the American people until the trip of the Oregon around the Cape during the Spanish War. There was great trepidation in the minds of our people, a fear that the Oregon might meet the Spanish fleet and be sunken. It has been a matter of regret since that it did not meet the Spanish fleet, as undoubtedly the Oregon, single-handed and alone, would have destroyed the entire fleet. When it became apparent to the American people that a battleship could not carry coal enough to sail from our Atlantic seaboard to Honolulu and that the canal was necessary from a military standpoint there was no longer any question as to its construction. Commercial purposes were entirely secondary to military purposes. The American people wanted a canal constructed by the people of the United States; they wanted it for protection in times of war, and with the customary American spirit they proceeded along lines to bring it about.

HISTORY OF ISTHMUS.

It had been the dream of many a seafaring adventurer to find a western waterway from Europe to Cathay. Columbus above all others desired and dreamed it. Many attempts at colonization were made upon the Isthmus. As far back as 1671 it was an object of pillage and plunder. Nations of the world had their eyes on the proposition of a canal or some means of passing over the natural barrier between the oceans. Late in the eighteenth century a Spanish commission had explored the Nicaraguan route. Lord Nelson was at one time sent to the coast of Nicaragua to investigate the matter. They all found other discouraging problems besides the engineering ones. Climatic conditions were appalling and apparently unsurmountable.

The South American States were always willing to grant concessions for a liberal consideration. As early as 1830 the King of the Netherlands entered into an engagement with Nicaragua for the construction of a canal. In 1835 an agent of the United States was sent to the Governments of Central America and New Granada with reference to a canal proposition. In 1846 the United States negotiated its treaty with New Granada, evidencing a policy of "watchful waiting" even at that early period. The treaty with New Granada plays an important part in the further consideration of this question and in the evolution of conditions on the Isthmus.

In 1835 President Jackson sent Charles Biddle to Nicaragua. However, he went to New Granada and there obtained some concessions with reference to a canal across the Isthmus of Panama. He evidenced a very healthy personal interest in the matter by providing that two-thirds of the stock should be his property. His act was disavowed by our Government. Others were also sent, notably Eliza Hise, who negotiated a certain treaty with Nicaragua, which was likewise disavowed. Gen. Taylor sent Mr. E. G. Squire, who likewise concluded a treaty which was never ratified. The treaty with New Granada in 1846, before referred to, guaranteed to the Government of the United States that the right of way or transit across the Isthmus of Panama should be open and free to the Government and citizens of the United States. This was the first appearance on the Isthmus of the doctrine of the guarantee of neutrality.

In 1858 we find a French company intervening to secure concessions, and we find Cass declaring that this country would not tolerate interference in this affair by other nations.

In 1869 we find President Grant appointing the first interoceanic canal commission. The French company at Panama collapsed in 1888. It seemed impossible for other nations to do this great work. There was only one nation with the energy, courage, ability, and money to undertake this work, and that was the United States. When it was determined so to do it found itself confronted with the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. England at an early date had placed a "cocked hat" on an old Indian chief and hailed him as "King of the Mosquitos." They assumed through this some rights of sovereignty in the Mosquito territory and worked out a process by which they held the eastern end of what would be the Nicaraguan canal. This was the basis of England's right in the matter.

Our country had been through a Mexican war, and there did not seem to be a desire in this country to undertake the great work by itself. England had large territory on both oceans. It seemed wise to our Government that the canal be under joint supervision. Consequently we surrendered the Monroe doctrine and entered into the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. This undoubtedly prevented trouble with England, as she had taken possession of Tigre Island and was asserting rights in the Isthmus. It averted trouble then, but not now, and was an exhibition of that shortsighted national policy that looks only to the present day and sees not the future.

I desire briefly to sum up the arguments on both sides of this troublesome question.

ARGUMENTS FOR WHAT MAY BE CALLED THE ENGLISH THEORY OF THE TREATY CONSTRUCTION.

Whether by methods to be condemned or not, yet it is a fact that England had secured certain rights in the Central American States prior to the making of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. This Nation was then willing to have Great Britain assist in the work of constructing a canal between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by way of Nicaragua. This had been embodied in the famous Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Article 8, which will become important hereafter in the discussion, is inserted at this point:

ART. 8. The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired in entering into this convention to accomplish a particular object but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

The preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty refers in terms to the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It may be argued with some degree of force that while article 8 itself is not incorporated in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, yet the general principle of neutralization is equality in the use of the canal to the United States and Great Britain as expressed in said article. It may be argued that equal treatment was intended; that outside of treaties there is a broad reason for equality of treatment; that this canal was to be a connecting of the great oceans; that the oceans are and should be free without any limitation whatever; that equality is ideal justice; that whoever pierces the great Isthmus must do so for the benefit of all mankind; that the wedding of the oceans must be an international event.

The distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] in his remarkable address yesterday pointed out and quoted from Thomas Jefferson, and I quote another part of Jefferson's writings, which I think the Senator from Ohio did not quote. Jefferson announced in 1792:

The ocean is free to all men and the rivers to all their inhabitants.

The United States has fought limitations on the freedom of the seas. Great Britain in early days exercised her search and seizure against which we ever protested. We have beheld in history the Barbary pirates holding the gates of the Mediterranean at the Straits of Gibraltar and levying toll upon all people desiring to use the sea. The Red Sea and the Persian Gulf have also been held by sea pirates in the centuries gone by.

The United States, in pursuit of its lofty ideals, has waged warfare against such practice. It sent its fleet into the Mediterranean and forced the Sultan of Morocco to negotiate, refusing to yield to tribute upon the seas. It was well said by Dr. Williams in his address before the American Society of International Law:

Where the flag flew, there the world began to know the freedom of the seas was asserted, and no land could claim more than another in the equal rights of all men to the world's waters.

The United States in 1852 demanded the freedom of the Amazon and ultimately the Amazon was free. So it may well be argued that for the peace of the waters, the great rivers of the world, where they invade more than one sovereignty, should be open on absolutely equal terms to the citizens of all nations; that the Panama Canal, as one of the great waters of the world, should be open and free to all nations; that it is a day of great things; that the mighty Republic of the West, by opening this canal on exactly the same terms to all the nations of the earth, is merely following the high ideals which have ever been a part of its national life. Such view is certainly idealistic.

It also is argued by those who favor what has been termed the England construction of this treaty as follows: England secured certain rights under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and admittedly gave up many of them in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Now, what did she secure in the way of privileges for the rights given up? What was the quid pro quo? And they answer, equality of treatment. Section 1 of article 3 is the one around which revolves the strong argument of those holding this view. This article is as follows:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

On reading this article in an ordinary, common-sense way, it would seem rather clear that the same terms as to the passage of vessels of commerce and of war through this canal should be extended to all nations.

Further, as reference is made in the treaty to the convention of Constantinople, and as the Suez Canal, provided for by said convention, is free and open to vessels of commerce and of war of all nations, additional weight is added to the argument.

Again, what is known as the Davis amendment, which is as follows:

It is agreed, however, that none of the immediately foregoing conditions and stipulations in sections numbered one, two, three, four, and five of this article shall apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order—was adopted by the Senate when the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was presented, and would seem to indicate that the Senate understood the provisions of various sections of article 3 to apply to the United States, otherwise no need of the Davis amendment.

Again, if, as stated by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], sections 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 of article 3 obviously do not apply to the United States, then why is a provision inserted in section 2:

The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

Certainly if this section did not apply to the United States there was no need for any such provision; the United States would have this right by virtue of its sovereignty.

Again, it may be argued that the minds of the parties did not meet on any such construction as this country two years ago gave to the treaty, and our attention must necessarily be invited to the correspondence between Mr. Choate, who was our ambassador to Great Britain at the time, and Secretary Hay. Mr. Choate's letter to Senator O'Gorman, of date April 13, 1914, is most interesting. I insert it as part of my remarks:

8 EAST SIXTY-THIRD STREET,
New York, April 3, 1914.

DEAR SENATOR O'GORMAN: As I am unavoidably prevented from accepting the courteous invitation of your Interoceanic Canals Committee for to-morrow, I avail myself of your kind permission to submit anything of mine not already published that might throw light on the pending question.

I accordingly, with the express permission of the Secretary of State, submit to your committee the inclosed copies of letters written by me to Secretary Hay between August 3 and October 12, 1901, giving step by step the negotiations between Lord Lansdowne and Lord Pauncefote and myself in regard to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

These, if carefully perused, will, I think, be found to confirm my views that the clause in the Panama Canal act exempting our coastwise shipping from tolls is a clear violation of the treaty.

With great respect, most truly, yours,

JOSEPH H. CHOATE.

Mr. White, the only other person living who has first-hand information, has testified before the committee. It may be gathered fairly from his testimony and his letters to Mr. Hay that he took the matter up with Lord Salisbury and that Lord Salisbury was favorable to a change in the treaty, provided the canal was to be open to the ships of all countries on equal terms. It is rather clear, I think, from Mr. White's testimony before the committee that the question of the coastwise shipping was never discussed or thought of with relation to this treaty. Again, much argument can be indulged in over the Bard amendment, which is as follows:

ART. 3. The United States reserves the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade.

Twenty-seven votes were cast for this, and 43 against. It is stated by Senator LODGE in his speech, and also by Senator Foraker, and in a letter by Mr. Bard himself, that the Bard amendment was voted down because it was considered unnecessary. Inasmuch as 27 votes were cast for it, it would seem that some Senators considered it necessary, and notwithstanding the statement of Mr. Bard, and of others, the voting down of the Bard amendment is fairly to be thrown into the scale in the determination of this question. Its weight as argument, however, is much lessened by the fact that it was proposed to the first Hay-Pauncefote and not to the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty. If open sessions had been held for the discussion of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and the records preserved, we possibly would not have had all this trouble. If the Bard amendment had been adopted, the present discussion never would have occurred. Reading the correspondence preceding the Hay-Pauncefote treaty between the representatives of the various Governments, it is apparent that they did have in mind equal treatment and no discrimination. But the correspondence does not clear up the point as to whether such equal treatment was to be extended by the nation building the canal to all of the nations using it, including the builder, or whether that equal treatment was merely to be between the nations using the canal outside of the owner thereof.

It is a strong argument advanced that if the canal had been constructed by a corporation or individual the vessels of the United States would have to be treated the same as the vessels of any other nation. Likewise can the adherents of this view point to the general history preceding the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

In 1857 Secretary Cass had said to Great Britain:

The United States, as I have before had occasion to assure your lordship, demand no exclusive privileges in these passages, but will always exert their influence to secure their free and unrestricted benefits, both in peace and war, to the commerce of the world.

Mr. Blaine said to Mr. Lowell in 1881, directing Mr. Lowell to propose to Great Britain the modification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty:

The United States recognizes a proper guaranty of neutrality as essential to the construction and successful operation of any highway across the Isthmus of Panama, and in the last generation every step was taken by this Government that is deemed requisite in the premises. The necessity was foreseen and abundantly provided for long in advance of any possible call for the actual exercise of power * * *. Nor in time of peace does the United States seek to have any exclusive privileges accorded to American ships in respect to precedence or tolls through an interoceanic canal any more than it has sought like privileges for American goods in transit over the Panama Railway under the exclusive control of an American corporation. The extent of the privileges of American citizens and ships is measurable under the treaty of 1846 by those of Colombian citizens and ships. It would be our earnest desire and expectation to see the world's peaceful commerce enjoy the same just, liberal, and rational treatment.

Much of the language of Secretary Blaine might be quoted to the same effect; particularly his reference to the duty of the United States to Colombia under the treaty of 1846. Mr. Blaine assured Great Britain that:

There has never been the slightest doubt on the part of the United States as to the purpose or extent of the obligation then assumed, by which it became surety alike for the free transit of the world's commerce over whatever landway or waterway might be opened from sea to sea, and for the protection of the territorial rights of Colombia from aggression or interference of any kind. Nor has there ever been room to question the full extent of the advantages and benefits, naturally due to its geographical position and political relations on the Western Continent, which the United States obtained from the owner of the isthmian territory in exchange for that far-reaching and responsible guaranty.

Again it is argued that the Panama strip is not our territory except in trust, and that the treaty with Panama further provides in article 18:

The canal when constructed, and the entrances thereto, shall be neutral in perpetuity and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of article 3, of, and in conformity with all the stipulations of, the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901.

And it can well be argued that we have taken the Canal Zone as a great trust for the maintenance of a canal and have recognized that it should be carried on in accordance with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Other arguments can be advanced. I have tried briefly to summarize the leading ones.

ARGUMENTS IN FAVOR OF THE AMERICAN THEORY OF THE TREATY.

Many arguments can be presented on the other side of this controversy; among others—

That the canal has been built by the United States at an expense of $400,000,000 and a loss of many lives. It must be maintained by the United States; no other nation has any obligation either as to its maintenance or as to preserving the neutrality thereof. There is great expense attached to its maintenance. It is therefore unjust to expect England to have an equal voice or any voice in the administration of the affairs of the canal; that it is unfair for England to have equal benefits and not equal responsibilities.

That the United States is a sovereignty and has sovereign rights in the canal. Any nation seeking to impose a burden on its sovereignty assumes the burden of proof to make a clear case. Sovereignty carries with it the right to do as we please with our own.

Further, that the canal is the same as the Mississippi River—is a part of our great inland waterways.

Again, to the contrary, that it is an artificial channel, and being an artificial channel, according to the principles of international law, we may attach any conditions to it we please. In Moore's International Law, volume 3, page 268, it is written:

> While a natural thoroughfare, although wholly within the dominion of a Government, may be passed by commercial ships of right, yet the nation which constructs an artificial channel may attach such conditions to its use as it pleases.

That the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is no part of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Also, attention is called to the two Hay-Pauncefote treaties. Article 1 of the treaty of 1901 provides:

> The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th of April, 1850.

That this article marks the end of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

The general principle of neutralization referred to in the preamble, it can well be argued, is the principle as set forth in extenso in article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Hence the advocates of the American theory strongly contend that we have nothing whatever to do with the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in this discussion. The differences in the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, as submitted to the Senate, and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, as adopted, can be studied with interest and profit. The first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, article 2, provided:

> The high contracting parties desiring to preserve and maintain the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention.

The second Hay-Pauncefote treaty, or the one adopted, provides:

> The United States adopts.

The first Hay-Pauncefote treaty provided:

> The canal shall be free and open in time of war as in time of peace.

That is stricken from the second treaty. Great Britain suggested with reference to the first treaty the following provision:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations which shall agree to observe these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation so agreeing.

The United States would not accept this proposition, so that in the final treaty the provision was changed to read:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules.

And so forth.

If the suggestion of Great Britain had been adopted, we would have been under a contract obligation with all nations that might agree to observe these rules. This we were not willing to do.

That the term "all nations" does not mean the United States; that the treaty is merely an instrument by which the proprietor of a canal fixes and states the terms of use to its customers; that the United States does not regard itself as one of its customers; that five out of the six treaty rules for the use of the canal do not apply to the United States, and consequently it is a reasonable conclusion that the sixth also was not meant so to apply; that the reference to the basis of neutralization as embodied in the convention of Constantinople is not in point, because by that convention the rules apply to vessels using the Suez Canal in times of war or in times of peace without distinction of flag. Further, the rights of Turkey as a territorial power are reserved; and, further, attention is called to the reservation of Great Britain when it signed the convention providing for the free use of the Suez Canal, which reservation was as follows:

> The British delegates, in presenting this draft of a treaty as the definitive regulation intended to guarantee the free use of the Suez Canal, think it their duty to formulate a general reservation as to the application of these provisions in so far as they may not be compatible with the transitory and exceptional condition of things actually existing in Egypt, and may limit the freedom of action of their Government during the period of the occupation of Egypt by the forces of Her Britannic Majesty.

Under this reservation it would seem that Great Britain could use the Suez Canal for warlike operations, could blockade it in time of war, could disembark troops, munitions or materials of war therein.

It is further argued that when the United States was expecting to be merely one of the users of the canal it insisted upon certain equality of treatment and charges and did not concern itself about the rights of the canal owner; that when it became owner an entirely different situation was presented; that if rule 1 of article 3 is to receive the construction contended, then vessels of war must be treated the same as vessels of commerce; that we could not in case of war with Japan prevent a Japanese war vessel from passing through the canal, but must escort it through on its way to bombard New York or New Orleans; that this country could not embark or disembark troops or munitions of war in the canal; that any of our own vessels of war could not remain there over 24 hours and could not depart within 24 hours after the departure of the vessel of war of a belligerent nation. And all of this when we were keeping up the canal as an American institution. Of course, Mr. President, if we have agreed to place ourselves in this position we should abide by it, but we, acting as trustees of the people's rights, should be solemnly convinced of this before we abandon the point.

Again, that in our treaty with Panama we provided for the passage of the Panaman boats through the canal free and that this was not seriously objected to by England for nine years.

Again, in the Hay-Herran treaty, negotiated by Mr. Hay, it was provided:

> The canal when constructed, and the entrance thereto, shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be open upon the terms provided for by section 1 of article 3, in conformity with all the stipulations of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

The next article provided that the Government of Colombia shall have the right to transport over the canal its vessels, troops, and munitions of war at all times without paying charges of any kind. It would be hard to understand how Mr. Hay wrote this portion of the treaty if he did not believe the United States had greater rights in the canal than England, although the provision may perhaps be accounted for on the "favored-nation doctrine."

The insistence of the United States upon striking the prohibition against fortifications from the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and its insistence on the right to fortify was, as is set forth so clearly by Senator LODGE in his address on this subject, an assertion on the part of the United States of its absolute control of the canal in time of war.

That the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was considered obsolete in this country previous to the adoption of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. In this connection it is important to note that the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Fifty-first Congress presented a review of the history of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and reported to the Senate its conclusion that it had become obsolete, and—> that the United States is at present under no obligations, measured either by the terms of the convention, the principles of public law, or good morals, to refrain from promoting in any way it may deem best for its own interests the construction of this canal without regard to anything contained in the convention of 1850.

Every member of the committee signed this report, including Messrs. Evarts and Sherman, who have held the office of Secretary of State in this country.

Further, that the British Government has never claimed that we have not the right to exempt our coastwise trade from the payment of tolls; that there is absolutely no discrimination against Great Britain, because Great Britain has no right to engage in our coastwise trade. There can be no discrimination in the exercise of a right as against a nation which does not enjoy that right, and our Supreme Court, in the case of Olsen v. Smith, has settled this question. I quote from the opinion (Olsen v. Smith, 195 U. S., 332, p. 344). It is said by the court:

> Nor is there merit in the contention that as the vessel in question was a British vessel coming from a foreign port the State laws concerning pilotage are in conflict with a treaty between Great Britain and the United States, providing that "no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States." Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage, resulting from the law of the United States, nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law, concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade. In substance the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even although such regulations apply without discrimination to all vessels engaged in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign.

That Great Britain has not interpreted her treaties in the way she seeks to compel the United States to interpret the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. In the treaty of 1815 it was provided:

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in the ports of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

Under that provision it has always been held by Great Britain that she could do as she pleased with her coastwise trade, and she has favored such vessels. On the other hand, the United States has held that "vessels of a nation," as used in treaties, do not embrace vessels engaged in the coastwise trade. For instance, the treaty between the United States and Denmark of 1826 had a provision in it as follows:

Nor shall higher or other charges of any kind be imposed in the ports of one party upon vessels of the other than are or shall be payable in the same ports by native vessels.

The United States has never hesitated under this to except its coastwise trade.

There may be summoned also to this controversy the words of many of our wisest men—ex-President Roosevelt, ex-President Taft, Secretary Knox, Richard Olney, and others who are on record as to the right of the Nation under the treaty to exempt coastwise vessels.

That the British representative, Mr. Innes, conceded in his note that bona fide coastwise vessels could pass through the canal free of toll without the same constituting a breach of the treaty, said note being as follows:

Chargé d'Affaires Innes to the Secretary of State.

BRITISH EMBASSY,
Kineo, Me., July 8, 1912.

SIR: The attention of His Majesty's Government has been called to the various proposals that have from time to time been made for the purpose of relieving American shipping from the burden of the tolls to be levied on vessels passing through the Panama Canal, and these proposals, together with the arguments that have been used to support them, have been carefully considered with a view to the bearing on them of the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain of November 18, 1901.

The proposals may be summed up as follows:

(1) To exempt all American shipping from the tolls.

(2) To refund to all American ships the tolls which they may have paid.

(3) To exempt American ships engaged in the coastwise trade.

(4) To repay the tolls to American ships engaged in the coastwise trade.

The proposal to exempt all American shipping from the payment of the tolls would, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, involve an infraction of the treaty, nor is there in their opinion any difference in principle between charging tolls only to refund them and remitting tolls altogether. The result is the same in either case, and the adoption of the alternative method of refunding the tolls in preference to that of remitting them, while perhaps complying with the letter of the treaty, would still contravene its spirit.

It has been argued that a refund of the tolls would merely be equivalent to a subsidy and that there is nothing in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which limits the right of the United States to subsidize its shipping. It is true that there is nothing in that treaty to prevent the United States from subsidizing its shipping, and if it granted a subsidy His Majesty's Government could not be in a position to complain. But there is a great distinction between a general subsidy, either to shipping at large or to shipping engaged in any given trade, and a subsidy calculated particularly with reference to the amount of user of the canal by the subsidized lines or vessels. If such a subsidy were granted it would not, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, be in accordance with the obligations of the treaty.

As to the proposal that exemption shall be given to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, a more difficult question arises. If the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic which is reserved for United States vessels would be benefited by this exemption it may be that no objection could be taken. But it appears to my Government that it would be impossible to frame regulations which would prevent the exemption from resulting, in fact, in a preference to United States shipping and consequently in an infraction of the treaty.

I have, etc.,

A. MITCHELL INNES.

Weight must be given to the statements of Senator LODGE and ex-Senator Foraker, that they were members of the Foreign Relations Committee, and that it never was otherwise contended but that the United States should have the right to pass the coastwise vessels through free of tolls.

ANOTHER ARGUMENT ALONG A SLIGHTLY DIFFERENT LINE MAY WELL BE MADE.

That the explicit language of the Clayton-Bulwer convention in respect to equality of treatment was not employed in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty applied only to the Nicaraguan route; that while article 8 of the treaty obligated the parties to extend their protection by treaty stipulation to the Panama route or the Tehuantepec route, no such treaty stipulations were ever made.

That under the treaty obligations with New Granada the United States guaranteed the neutrality of the Isthmus of Panama so that at the time of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the United States was exercising a protectorate over the Isthmus of Panama and had certain well-defined rights growing out of its treaty with New Granada. That without material modification of the treaty with New Granada the Clayton-Bulwer convention could not have applied to Panama; and no such stipulations for the extension of the Clayton-Bulwer convention to the Panama route ever being effective, the Clayton-Bulwer convention had nothing whatever to do with the Panama route.

That the right held by the United States under the New Granada treaty was equivalent to an easement over the Isthmus of Panama, and that this easement ripened into a fee simple title when the treaty of Panama was made. That the United States has had rights in the Isthmus superior to those of England since 1846, by virtue of its treaty with New Granada; that even if Great Britain did surrender certain rights when she consented to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer convention she was relieved of the joint obligation to promote the building of the canal and relieved from any obligation to assist in maintaining its neutrality.

That at the time of the adoption of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty public sentiment was such in the United States that in response thereto the Clayton-Bulwer treaty undoubtedly would have been abrogated.

That Great Britain will receive more benefit from the canal than any other nation on account of her great tonnage and her possessions in Asia and Australia; that she will likewise receive great benefit because it will enable her to have a naval basis in British America upon both oceans, practically doubling the efficiency of her navy.

That it is fair to assume that Great Britain took these matters into consideration in giving up whatever rights she may have had under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

That Great Britain has conceded the right of the United States to exercise belligerent rights for the protection of the canal in the noted protest of November 14, 1912, which says:

Now that the United States has become the practical sovereign of the canal, His Majesty's Government do not question its title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection.

That the language of the Washington treaty is not the same as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and that no help can be gathered therefrom, article 27 of said treaty providing that:

Great Britain will engage to urge upon the Canadian Government to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion—and the United States engaging that the subjects of Great Britain—shall enjoy the use of the St. Clair Flats Canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.

Quite different language. If such language had been employed in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the present troubles would not have arisen.

That Lord Lansdowne's communication of October 23, 1901, to Lord Pauncefote tends quite strongly to show that England's desire was merely to obtain equality of treatment with other nations.

I have endeavored briefly to marshal some of the points in favor of the English contention and in favor of the contention of the United States. There is sufficient to show that it is a debatable proposition.

NEUTRALIZATION.

There is another point that appeals to a lawyer. It may be technical, but I am sure if any lawyer were presenting this matter to a court he would feel compelled in duty to urge it. It would have additional weight if we should adopt the rule Lord Clarendon applied against the United States in construing the Clayton-Bulwer treaty with relation to the Mosquito Indians when he said:

The true construction of a treaty must be deduced from the literal meaning of the words employed in the framing.

If this is to be done there is force, I think, in the argument that the neutralization referred to in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty relates only to times of war. Neutrality or neutralization is a war term. There can be no such thing as neutrality unless there are belligerents. We can only be neutral as between others. The United States made this canal neutral as between contending belligerent nations. Neutrality in peace is unheard of. The term "neutralization" is not employed by international law writers—save one—to apply to peace.

Article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was for the purpose of laying down a set of rules to preserve the neutralization of a canal in times of war. Every rule, it is conceded, except rule 1, refers to war. The words in the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty in section 1, article 2, "in time of war as in time of peace," were stricken out, showing that there was a feeling then that neutrality related only to war.

Why can it not well be argued that the purpose of rule 1, article 3, was to have the canal free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality during times of war; that such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable during times of war? Article 2 gives the right to the United States to enjoy all the privileges incident to construction as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal; that is the provision that governs in times of peace and enables the United States to do as it pleases with its own commerce.

The general principle of neutralization that is spoken of in the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty relates back to article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and does provide for equal terms to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain as to the canal which might be constructed or the railway. No complaint has been made as to discrimination on the railway in favor of the United States.

Of course, if the term "neutralization" is to mean impartial treatment in times of peace, as some contend, then the argument I am trying to make as to neutralization is destroyed. It is, however, a perverted use of the term and is absolutely without authority. I desire to cite some authorities on the proposition.

SOME AUTHORITIES ON THE PROPOSITION OF NEUTRALITY.

Speaking of the characteristics of international law, Phillimore says:

It is a matter for rejoicing that it has escaped the Procrustean treatment of positive legislation and has been allowed to grow to its fair proportions under the influence of that science which works out of conscience, reason, and experience the great problem of law or civil justice.

Dr. Oppenheim, in his work on international law, says:

Such States as do not take part in a war between other States are neutrals. The term "neutrality" derives from the Latin neuter. Neutrality may be defined as the attitude of impartiality toward belligerents adopted by third States and recognized by belligerents, such attitude creating rights and duties between the impartial States and the belligerents.

Again:

Neutrals must prevent belligerents from making use of their neutral territory and of their resources for military and naval purposes during the war.

Again:

Neutrality is a condition during a condition of war only; rights and duties deriving from neutrality do not exist before the outbreak of war.

Neutralization is defined in Murray's Dictionary (London, 1908) as "the action of making neutral in time of war."

Neutrality is considered by Westlake in his International Law, and, among other things, he says:

Neutrality enjoins abstinence from taking part in any operation of war and from interfering with any operation of war which is legitimate as between the belligerents, but not abstinence from anything merely because it strengthens a belligerent.

A neutral State must not permit either its subjects or a belligerent to make any such use of its territory as amounts to taking part in an operation of war.

Again, he says:

A State is neutral when there is a war and it is not in a state of war with either belligerent.

Again:

Neutrality is not morally justifiable unless intervention in the war is unlikely to promote justice or could do so only at a ruinous cost to the neutral.

Neutrals avoid acts of war because they decline to enter into war. From Vattel down to the present time I think it is safe to say that no authority holds that neutrality relates to anything other than war.

Jefferson wrote, in June, 1793:

It is the right of every nation to prohibit acts of sovereignty from being exercised from any other within its limit and the duty of a neutral nation to prohibit such as would injure one of the warring powers.

The United States has been one of the leaders in maintaining the principle of neutrality; it has thereby excited the commendation of other nations.

Mr. Canning, when secretary of state for foreign affairs, in urging upon his countrymen the example of the United States in a memorable speech in the House of Commons, April 16, 1823, used the following language:

I do not now pretend to argue in favor of a system of neutrality, but it being declared (by proclamation) that we intend to remain neutral. I call upon the House to abide by that declaration so long as it shall remain unaltered. * * * We have spent much time in teaching other powers the nature of a strict neutrality, and, generally speaking, we have found them most reluctant scholars. All I now call upon the House to do is to adopt the same course which it has recommended to neutral powers upon former occasions. If I wished for a guide in a system of neutrality, I should take that laid down by America in the days of the Presidency of Washington and the Secretaryship of Jefferson.

After giving a brief historical summary of that system and practice, he then added:

Here, sir, I contend, is the principle of neutrality upon which we ought to act. (Hansard, Parl. Deb., vol. viii, 1056.)

From these authorities it may well be argued with great force that the rules with relation to the neutralization of the canal have no reference whatever to times of peace.

CHANGE OF CONDITIONS GIVES RIGHT TO ABROGATE TREATY.

At the time of the adoption of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty it was not contemplated that the United States would own the land where the canal was to be constructed. It is true there was a provision with relation to change of sovereignty, but that evidently applied to unsettled conditions in the Central American States. Therefore, as conditions have changed by purchase of the land and the ownership thereof, whether in fee or in trust, passing to the United States, as a matter of international law the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is voidable and could be concluded and either party would have the right to notify the other that it regarded the treaty as abrogated. And that principle is sustained by authority, from Vattel's Law of Nations down to Hall on International Law. Dr. Oppenheim, in his work on international law, has said with reference to this subject:

It is an almost universally recognized fact that vital changes of circumstances may be of such a kind as to justify a party in notifying an unnotifiable treaty. The vast majority of publicists, as well as all the Governments of the members of the family of nations, agree that all treaties are concluded under the tacit condition rebus sic stantibus.

As eminent authority as Mr. Hannis Taylor has also advanced this view, as follows, in his treatise on international law:

So unstable are the conditions of international existence, and so difficult is it to enforce a contract between States after the state of facts upon which it was founded has substantially changed, that all such agreements are necessarily made subject to the general understanding that they shall cease to be obligatory so soon as the conditions upon which they were executed are essentially altered.

Sir Edward Grey, in his communication to Ambassador Bryce, November 14, 1912, stated:

At the date of the signature of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the territory on which the Isthmian Canal was to be constructed did not belong to the United States, consequently there was no need to insert in the draft treaty provisions corresponding to those in articles 10 and 13 of the Suez Canal convention, which preserve the sovereign rights of Turkey and of Egypt, and stipulate that articles 4 and 5 shall not affect the right of Turkey, as the local sovereign, and of Egypt.

Seeming to imply that if it had been known or intended that the canal was to be built on American soil there would have been other provisions added to this treaty.

Further, it can be claimed with the voice of authority that if the act of Congress granting free tolls was a violation of the treaty it acted as an abrogation of said treaty.

If this case was one presented to a court of a number of members there would most certainly be a disagreement among the court. The best legal minds in the country have differed, honestly differed; men in this Chamber differ, honestly differ. Each one has tried to solve the question according to his ability and judgment. Were I compelled, in determining how my vote shall be cast, to determine it upon the treaty question, I should resolve the doubt I might have in favor of what may be termed the "American construction"; the great weight of the argument is on that side. The burden of proof is on Great Britain to make a clear case. The argument seems to me unanswerable—that there can be no discrimination in the coastwise trade as against Great Britain for the very clear reason that Great Britain is not entitled to engage in our coastwise trade.

The very fact that this is a debatable question, however, it seems to me calls upon us to submit the same to arbitration. We have a treaty now of arbitration which expressly covers disputes concerning a treaty.

I had placed in the RECORD some time ago a letter from Theodore Roosevelt to Dr. Lyman Abbott, of date January 7, 1913, in which he said:

I believe it to be the bounden duty of this Nation to arbitrate the question of the canal tolls under the provision of our arbitration treaty.

In the address of Hon. Richard Olney before the American Society of International Law, after sustaining by his argument the American side of the controversy, he said:

But to the English contention that the controversy should be referred to arbitration there seems to be no sufficient answer; both countries are firmly committed to arbitration as the best method for the settlement of international disputes.

If we believe in the principle of arbitration, we are now put to the test, and this Nation could advance the cause of universal peace in no surer way than to submit this question to a commission of arbitration, which need not be The Hague, but may be a commission composed of justices of our Supreme Court and of the high court of England. No one ought to object to such a course, and I have been rather amazed that there is objection to it.

What do our arbitration treaties amount to if we are not ready to submit a question of tolls on a canal, if we take the position that this is a question of vital interest and a question of national honor? If it is, there is no question that could arise but what we could take the same position. Rather arrogant for one party to a contract to assume the right to decide what it means.

I have been earnestly for the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska and shall give it my hearty support. I am ready to arbitrate nearly any question. The amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] has great force and good common sense behind it.

Few would contend that we should arbitrate a question that went to the very life of the Nation, or an act against our national honor, or intended insult to our flag. I would not be one to favor arbitration in such case. But for the little disputes which arise between nations the same as disputes between individuals, it is equally as silly to go out with armies and navies and shoot and kill men and destroy cities as it is for individuals so to do when they are unable to agree. The misery, the sorrow, the desolation of war, outside of the great burden of taxation that it places upon the backs of the people, ought to be an unanswerable argument for arbitration.

My conviction as to arbitration was deepened a few days ago when I saw some of the fruits of war. The fruit of war is death. The glitter and pomp turn to ashes. As a member of a committee appointed by the Vice President, I attended at New York a week ago the exercises commemorative of the boys who lost their lives at Vera Cruz. The good ship Montana bore them home. A million people stood with bowed heads and tear-dimmed eyes as the sorrowful procession passed from the Battery up through the streets of New York, stopping at City Hall for a tribute from the mayor, and across the bridge to the Brooklyn Navy Yard. The President of the United States honored the dead heroes with his presence. The boxes inclosing the caskets were covered with the Old Flag and with beautiful flowers. Comrades in life acted as escorts for the dead. The chaplains prayed, the President of the United States with trembling voice spoke, the band played "Nearer My God to Thee," but the cold forms of somebody's boys in the caskets, sleeping the sleep that knows no waking, knew not of the great tribute a Nation was pouring out to their memory. As I looked at those 17 boxes lying side by side before the speaker's stand, I thought of other scenes, that somewhere there were 17 saddened homes; somewhere there were breaking mothers' hearts; somewhere sweethearts' sorrows, sisters' tears; somewhere a father with support of old age gone. And why all this? Why war? Why shoot down men made in the image of their God? Why bloody, mangled faces looking up from battlefields, dying in agony, to settle disputes in a Christian world? How can men want war? Why do they hesitate to do those things that may stop future wars? Why not lift from the backs of the people the great burden of war taxation; why not let vigorous youth live out their lives?

Mr. President, the day of universal peace must come; it must be true that some day "swords shall be beaten into plowshares, spears into pruning hooks." It may not be in your life time or in mine, but in God's good time it must be true that the principles of Him who, watching over Israel, slumbereth not nor sleeps, shall usher in that brighter day of Scotland's Bobby Burns:

Man to man the whole world o'er shall brothers be for a' that.

It shall not be many years until peace will come to her own. This would be a good time to set an example to the world, that the great Republic of the West is strong enough, and mighty enough, and fair enough to submit a question to arbitration, even if the majority of the nations of the world felt that the contention of the Republic was unsound. We would show the world that we were pursuing the things "which make for peace." To arbitrate is quite different from surrendering.

I desire to put in, as part of my remarks, a little article by Bert Morehouse on the subject of "Blessed are the peacemakers." It is short.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"BLESSED ARE THE PEACEMAKERS."

By Bert Morehouse.

The coming of another peace day, May 18, should serve to remind us that war is the greatest crime of the late centuries against home and Nation.

War murders multitudes of heroic men and squanders millions of dollars.

Since 1793 the total loss of life through war is more than 5,000,000 men; and war has placed the nations in debt for more than $23,000,000,000.

War and the preparation of war is the heaviest burden of the great nations of this modern day.

Our Civil War cost nearly half a million of lives and $5,000,000,000.

We sacrificed 20,000 lives and spent over $1,000,000,000 in our war with Spain.

Up to 1899 good will between nations was conspicuous by its absence. In that year the first Hague conference was held and adopted measures tending toward arbitration. In 1907 the Hague conference convened again and further advanced the cause of peace, finally resulting in 41 nations forming what is known as The Hague Tribunal.

The object of The Hague Tribunal is to arbitrate all matters of differences that may arise between these nations. It consists of a panel of 130 jurists appointed by the different countries, and has already heard and decided many important cases.

To-day, peace is coming into her own, and her advocates are many. There are peace organizations in all parts of the world.

Let us, then, think peace, talk peace, and act peace not only toward each other, but toward our fellow brothers and sisters in all the countries of the world.

"Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God."

If this question can not go to arbitration then we are called upon to exercise our best judgment and I criticize no man for the vote he may cast on this very debatable and troublesome proposition, nor do I join in the criticism of the President over the fact that he has changed his mind. Consistency has been said to be the hobgoblin of small minds; if men never changed their minds we would have but little progress. There may be proper criticism directed at a party repudiating a plank of its platform after election.

I do not hesitate to change my vote upon any question where, upon study, I have reached a different conclusion or concluded that my former vote was wrong. I voted before for the exemption from toll of the coastwise vessels through the canal, as the same was provided for in the general Panama Canal act; nearly everyone in the Senate did. I did not consider as seriously as I have now the question of subsidy. In fact that question was little considered or discussed.

This canal has been built at an enormous expense; the carrying charges will be large. Prof. Johnson has estimated that it will require $19,250,000 to make the canal commercially self-supporting. This is made up as follows: $3,500,000 for operating and maintenance expense; $500,000 for sanitation and Zone government; $250,000, which is the annuity payable to Panama under the treaty of 1913; $11,250,000 to pay 3 per cent on the $375,000,000 invested in the canal; and $3,750,000 for an amortization fund of 1 per cent per annum upon cost of the canal. Why should not boats passing through this canal, engaged in the coastwise trade and deriving an immediate benefit from the canal, pay some part of the expense that is made necessary by their very passage? The canal will be of great benefit to them even then. Their route is shortened some 6,000 miles; the unloading on the Atlantic side, the reloading on the Pacific side, the railroad expense of transportation across the Isthmus, are all eliminated. Is there any good reason why they should not pay tolls? If not pay tolls, then why pay freight charges now across the Isthmus? The canal will be just as much benefit to mankind if it pays expenses.

This Nation has contributed the $400,000,000 expended in its construction to the welfare of the world that will never be repaid. It is doubtful if returns will pay expenses even if all boats pay tolls. We certainly can not be accused as a Nation of lacking in generosity in our attempts to benefit mankind. In fixing the tolls the President took into account the coastwise vessels that might pass through the canal. Great Britain was assured that there was no discrimination against her on tolls because she is not compelled to pay any more than would be paid by her if every coastwise vessel passing through the canal paid toll. Then, if the foreign vessels passing through are not carrying this burden, who is? Evidently the Treasury of the United States; those who pay taxes to support the Government carry this burden. Is there any good reason why they should? I have not been able to discern any. Call this what we will, it is the voting of a special privilege to those engaged in a certain line of business, namely, the coastwise shipping, who now enjoy a monopoly in that business under our law, in that foreign nations can not engage therein.

It is difficult to draw the line at just what can be considered a subsidy. It has been argued here that appropriations for farm-demonstration work, hog-cholera cure, etc., are all in the nature of subsidy; that the appropriations to improve our harbors and rivers are in the nature of subsidy; there are locks and dams in many of our inland rivers, boats pass through without any expense to them; boats pass through the Soo without any expense to them; large sums are voted for highways in this country, and there is no thought of charging the farmer toll for the use of the highway in bringing his produce to market. It is argued that very much of the general appropriations of the Government go to what may be termed subsidy.

I think there is a difference, however, between the Panama situation and these suggested. Appropriations for agriculture go to the general prosperity; likewise the highways. We can not have a Nation without highways; they are the means of communication, they enter into the very existence and life of the people, are the national arteries. Internal rivers are a part, likewise, of our national existence. The Panama Canal is different; we could get along without it—we have during all the years of our history; there are a thousand miles of foreign seacoast between our country and the canal; it is an extraordinary, unusual, and artificial thing—a connection between the great oceans of the world. I am strongly inclined to the belief that where we have locks and dams on our inland waterways where boats pass through, necessitating an expense, they should pay some part of the upkeep; I can see no reason why they should not. If the passing of the coastwise vessels through the Panama Canal without toll resulted in a general prosperity for the Nation, the free tolls could be justified. I can not bring myself to believe that the passing of these few boats free of toll through the canal will have any influence upon the question of general prosperity. The only effect I have heard argued is the effect on railroad rates. It is claimed that the policy of free tolls will be productive of great public welfare in that it will be a regulator of railroad rates, that it will reduce transcontinental rates, and that this reduction will be reflected in a general prosperity.

We have an Interstate Commerce Commission, which commands the full respect of the people; if transcontinental rates are exorbitant they have the power to regulate them and fix fair and reasonable rates.

If transcontinental rates are reduced, the railroads, having the right to reasonable returns, would have to look elsewhere than to the transcontinental rates for such returns. And while I do not want to take a narrow view or a sectional view of this question, I fear that the freight rates in the Middle West might be increased to make up for the loss in transcontinental rates. I fail to see how that would be of any benefit to the people of the great Middle West.

The situation is difficult for one who is against subsidy and believes that free tolls are subsidy, but who likewise is against what may be considered any surrender of our right of sovereignty in the canal. If no amendments were offered whatever to the bill, I should vote for it, placing in the record, as I now do, the statement that my vote is cast solely on the economic question, that I reserve the right to meet the treaty question when it may properly arise, and that my vote for repeal is not a precedent as to any future action by me as a Senator in voting on the proposition of the construction of the treaty, I now maintaining that the United States has the right, if it desires to do so, to exempt from toll coastwise vessels passing through this canal.

If amendments are offered to the bill setting forth the proposition that we do not surrender any part of our sovereignty or any right in the control of this canal by the repeal of the clause relating to coastwise traffic, I shall support them and, if they are adopted, shall vote for the bill as amended.

If such amendments are voted down and a vote for repeal—in the parliamentary situation then confronting us—must be construed as a vote in favor of the English theory of the treaty construction, then I shall be compelled to vote against the repeal. I trust such situation may not arise. I earnestly hope the Simmons amendment or the Norris or Works amendment may be adopted. My preference is rather for the Works amendment, viz:

Strike out the amendment reported by the committee and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, That neither the passage of this act nor the imposition upon or collection of tolls from the ships of this country or its citizens for passing through the Panama Canal shall deprive the United States of the right as owner of said canal to exempt from the payment of such tolls any and all ships of the Government and its citizens at any future time, nor shall this act be construed as a waiver of such right or as an acceptance of or consent to such a construction of any treaty with a foreign country as will deny or abridge the same."

That is a clear-cut statement. Anyone in the future can understand what it means. Let us not have future generations quarreling and debating over what we mean when we repeal this clause in the law. If we are to repeal it because it is a violation of the treaty, let us say so; if it is to be repealed because we believe it a mistaken economic policy, let us say so. Let not the language of diplomacy that has made so much trouble in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty enter into the outcome of our present deliberations. We are victims now, as to this treaty, of too much diplomacy and too little common sense.

It is unfortunate, I think, that the President in his message made his strongest point in asking for repeal that the present law was a violation of the treaty. If he had placed it squarely on the economic ground, I believe it would have passed overwhelmingly.

I shall vote for repeal of the exemption clause in the Panama Canal act if the parliamentary situation when the vote is taken is such that said vote will not be a vote in favor of the English theory of construing the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Such vote will be cast solely on the economic ground, viz: That the passage of coastwise vessels through the Panama Canal without toll is a special privilege to a favored class and is in the nature of a subsidy. However, if that vote shall help the President in the foreign policy of his administration, and shall assist him in dealing "with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence," it will be a matter not of regret to me but of very sincere gratification.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of attention and profit, as we all did, to the speech just made by the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]. He is making, however, one very grave mistake, which runs throughout his entire argument. A vote to repeal this exemption is not a surrender of any position at anybody's temporary behest. It is not a surrender at all; it is merely a waiver for the time being.

If the Senator and I had a quarrel about a right of way which I contended that I had over his land, and if he came to me and said, "I deny your right of way through my place; I intend to contest it; I intend to litigate it; I intend to carry it to an impartial tribunal," and if I replied to a statement of that sort of thing by saying, "Very well, old fellow, there may be some doubt about it; at any rate, you are as fair a judge of the difference between us as I am; I will waive the exercise of what I contend to be my right until the right has been determined by an impartial tribunal," that would not be a surrender. It would be a waiver; it would be the ordinary, gentlemanly course of neighborly intercourse, which I contend ought to be pursued between nations as well as between individuals.

I can not too strongly emphasize, Mr. President, as far as I am concerned, my position and what I intend my vote to mean, and I recommend this to the Senator from Iowa, who has deserved and ought to have the applause of the Senate, and their congratulations, for many things which he has just said. What I intend to reflect by my vote is simply this: As long as this question is in dispute between the two high contracting parties, each one with an equal right to judge for itself, and neither with a complete right to judge for itself, I shall, by my vote, say that until some competent tribunal has decided the question of disputed interpretation I shall waive the enforcement of mine.

Now, it has been said that my attempt to enforce mine, or the attempt of the United States to enforce theirs, which is the real question, would not result in a war—in a great war; war with Great Britain—and that therefore we ought to go ahead and enforce it. Mr. President, that is a coward's plea. Everybody knows that the wise Government of Great Britain has written a law of international intercourse almost as invariable as the laws of the Medes and Persians, and that is that under no circumstances must Great Britain have war with the United States. Tory ministry, Liberal ministry, Conservative ministry, Whig ministry, all have followed that beaten path. It is as invariable a rule of international intercourse upon the part of whatsoever government exists in Great Britain as is the unwritten law of Russia to keep on toward Constantinople until they get there.

Now, men appeal to me and appeal to Senators to insist upon a certain course because the Government of Great Britain during recent years at any rate the most persistent friend this country has had internationally, whatever her former sins may have been, will not make war upon us in the enforcement of what she considers a treaty right, and therefore we should not make it the subject of negotiation, but go ahead and violate it and assert the right under the treaty, which we say we have the power to do and which we say, in a cowardly spirit, that we can all the more do because it will not be resisted.

I want to be distinctly understood in the vote which I am casting. I have made no speech upon this subject, and I do not intend to do so; but I want to be distinctly understood in saying that I am surrendering no right not only not at the behest of Great Britain, but not even at the behest of the President, not even at the behest of my own judgment. I am merely waiving pendente lite a right until that right has been determined, and determined by a competent tribunal, which must be a court of arbitration; and I shall gladly vote for any amendment properly worded which calls upon the President of the United States to enter into a treaty of arbitration with Great Britain for the submission to an impartial international tribunal of the question of their interpretation and the alleged interpretation of the American people of this treaty.

Now, Mr. President, while I am on my feet there are a few more things that I want to refer to. Senators have argued this case all the way through as if the United States had gotten absolutely nothing out of the Panama Canal. If the United States have no right to exempt themselves, mark you, but American shipowners, from tolls, the exemption of American shipowners will not put a dollar in the Treasury. The ships passing toll free or taxed do not belong to the United States Government. The United States Government is not, as the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] argued the other day, idly charging itself. It is charging John Smith and John Williams and Bill Jones, who own ships passing through the canal, just as it is charging Jean Valjean in France and Hermann Leftwitch in Germany, or somebody else, and there is no more identity of ownership with the United States Government of the ship in the one case than in the other.

Of course, the United States, as the owner of the canal, will not charge tolls to those ships which the United States Government owns—warships. It will, however, if it is wise, keep books on the subject. It will charge the Navy Department so much every time a ship passes through and will credit the canal operation with the same amount. But, of course, it would be thoroughly impossible for the owner of the canal to charge itself except by a process of bookkeeping.

The other day the Senator from Utah went on and made a long and a very able speech founded altogether upon the obvious double middle of regarding the United States in one case as the owner of the canal and in the other case as the owner of ships. As a Government, it does own the canal. As a Government, it has sovereignty over the American ships, but it does not own them.

But gentlemen would seem to think that we get nothing out of this. When we went into it we thought we were going to get a profit. I believe the first wise engineer's estimate was one hundred and sixty-odd million dollars, and we expected to get dividends by the operation of tolls that would constitute a very reasonable interest upon that amount, at much more than 2½ per cent, at which rate we as a Nation can borrow money.

Not only that, Mr. President, but the time will come when we can make a profit out of it. The first decade probably we will make none—there may be an annual deficit; I do not know—but the time will come, undoubtedly, when we will make a profit, and in consonance with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we shall have all the profit and nobody else have any.

So much for that. It is a very small matter. I would not care much if the entire thing were charged up to profit and loss to-morrow and the whole commerce through the canal were opened and free of tolls to the entire world, in accordance with the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. In a large and broad sense it is very frequently wise for a great people to charge a great enterprise up to profit and loss and then go ahead and charge only what is necessary for the annual upkeep, or else, going still further, charge nothing.

Gentlemen must not forget that whatsoever profit there may be in it, whatsoever collection of tolls there may be in it, that collection of tolls goes to our Treasury.

Now, Mr. President, I am not altogether of the President's view regarding this matter. I have made that clear before and I shall not enter into it again. I am inclined to the belief that, considering the mere letter of the treaty independent of the res gestæ—the contemporaneous negotiations and the letters accompanying it, wording the opinions expressed by those who acted as our agents—if we are to take merely the letter of the treaty as it is now written independently of its spirit, we have a right to exempt coastwise ships upon the line of reasoning exhibited by the Supreme Court in the case of Smith versus Olsen. But the very fact that we are debating the point is proof positive of the fact that any interpretation of the instrument is ambiguous and doubtful, and the moment you admit that the interpretation is doubtful and the language of the instrument is ambiguous that moment you have lost all as a right to judge by your own case. You have regard to the comity of nations if you dare to say that we will be the sole judge in a case wherein we are one of the parties. And you have done worse than that if you go further and say the reason for it is that you know you will not have war then, and you have added cowardice to tyranny or to dogmatism, whichever you may call it.

I am not altogether of the President's view, but just at this moment I want to impress upon the Senate the President's view with the idea of defending him from certain charges that have been made by Democrats to Democrats in connection with the Democratic platform. The President is of the personal opinion that exempting coastwise ships from tolls is a violation of the treaty, and yet we hear Democrats on this floor criticizing the President because he is not keeping a plank in a partisan American platform. Will any man arise and so offend the moral sense of the American people as to say that a plank in a party platform in the United States is superior in obligation upon me as a Democrat or upon the President as a Democrat to that greatest of all obligations resting upon a nation, to wit, the obligation of observing inviolate the sanctity of solemn treaties?

I heard a Senator here the other day argue for three-quarters of an hour that this was a violation of the treaty, and then with lame impotence conclude his argument by saying that, "notwithstanding that fact, he felt bound and obligated by the plank in the Democratic platform."

I am a Bourbon Democrat, Mr. President. I belong to the class of Democrats who forget nothing Democratic and learn nothing un-Democratic, if I know it. But Bourbon Democrat as I am, there is something in this world a lot more sacred to me than a plank in a platform, and that is the Nation's faith, the Nation's honor, the Nation's word, which is the outward and visible sign of the inward grace of its owners. How the belief of the President of the United States that this is a violation of a solemn treaty can for one moment be criticized by any Democrat as violating a party plank in order to arrive at the observance of national faith is something which I can not understand. It is true I do not agree with the President that the exemption is a violation at all of the treaty; but if I did, I do not see how anyone could expect me to pay any attention to a plank in a party partisan platform purely touching the course of the nation as a nation and not prepared with any view of violating any treaty. It must be presumed that the men who adopted that platform thought that it did not violate a treaty, or else they would not have adopted it, or if they had known it and did consciously violate a treaty and adopted it anyhow, then the Democratic Party ought to be sent to the very narrowmost depth to which human contempt could precipitate it.

Mr. President, I have not intended to take up the time of the Senate. I got up mainly to have read an answer to some of the points made by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] the other day. As far as I am concerned, I am tired of this debate. You are tired of it, and, if you do not know it, I can tell you the country is tired of it. Men, women, and children are beginning to laugh at us. You are keeping it up a little bit too long. Day after day you are running over the same ground on one side and then on the other. There is, I take it, not one new thing to be said except that little thing about the profits of the canal, which at this moment has been stated. Each one of you knows how he is going to vote. You are just consuming the time of 90,000,000 people of the United States, and I am helping you to do it.

Mr. President, I ask that the Secretary read this from the desk. If not, I will read it myself; but it is an argument by Crammond Kennedy, who is, from what I gather, a lawyer here. It cites authorities to disprove various dicta which the Senator from New York made the other day—for example, that the word "commerce" relates only to international commerce, notwithstanding the clause of the Constitution which includes it all in one phrase, "commerce with foreign nations and between the States," and that "vessels" always mean vessels of the deep sea and never any other sort of vessels, and some other things and minor things hardly worth answering, yet well enough to be replied to, in order that the ears of the groundlings may be tickled while the minds of the judicious are made to grieve.

Mr. STONE. I wish to say to the Senator from Mississippi that yesterday or the day before, I forget which, I had that paper inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let me see if it is the one. There is another. There is another letter written some time ago. If it has been inserted in the RECORD, I will not have it inserted now.

Mr. STONE (after examining). It is the same article.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Missouri has already had the article inserted in the RECORD, and I shall therefore not ask that it be again read.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask that the canal-tolls bill be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GORE. I ask that the Agricultural appropriation bill be now laid before the Senate and proceeded with.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13679) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

Mr. JAMES. Is there an amendment pending before the Senate now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is. The pending question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON].

Mr. JAMES. I submitted an amendment several days ago, which is on the Secretary's desk. I should like to have it read after the pending amendment is disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the pending amendment.

Mr. JAMES. I see that the Senator from Iowa has just entered the Chamber. I was going to suggest the absence of a quorum.

The SECRETARY. On page 20, lines 18 and 19, strike out the words and figures "and for farm demonstration work, $400,000," and insert "$250,000."

On page 20, line 22, after the word "stock," insert:

For farm demonstration work outside of the cotton belt, $400,000.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think we should have a quorum when the Senate proceeds to discuss this amendment. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Page	Sterling
Borah	Hollis	Perkins	Stone
Brady	James	Pittman	Sutherland
Bristow	Johnson	Pomerene	Swanson

Cummins	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.	Williams
Dillingham	Norris	Smith, Mich.	Works
Fall	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.
Gore	Overman	Smoot

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON].

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I want to take just a moment or two in explaining this amendment. I rather think there will be little opposition to it when it is understood. This clause on page 20 seeks to provide for farm demonstration work in the North and in the South. On page 20 of the bill the provision with respect to what is termed by the chairman of the committee "work in the Northern States" is as follows:

To investigate and encourage the adoption of improved methods of farm management and farm practice, and for farm demonstration work, $400,000.

The chairman of the committee, as I understand and as it is generally understood, states that sum to be for farm demonstration work in the North. I am not now going into the question of the merits or the demerits of the farm demonstration work. I think it is agreed by all to be a splendid thing. The next clause provides:

For farmers' cooperative demonstrations and for the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton-boll weevil, $628,240.

That is for farm demonstration work in the South, and it is so used and so regarded. I think there is no voice of discord on that.

Mr. President, I am not objecting to that large appropriation for the South. I think they ought to have more for this work than we in the North, because I think they possibly need it more than we need it; but as the bill is drawn the $400,000 which is to be used for the North and which my amendment contemplates shall be so used, as it now is in the bill is not used for the farm demonstration work in the North; that is, the entire amount is not so used.

I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the hearings before the House committee. Of the $400,000 which the bill provides, the estimate for 1915 shows that out of that is to be used for administration, $23,935; for farm economics, $53,137; for special farm-management studies, $42,122; for farm management and field studies, $98,696; for utilization of cacti and other dry-land plants, $9,000. So out of the $400,000 there is to be used about $250,000, speaking not exactly accurately, in work that is not farm-demonstration work, and that applies equally to the South as well as to the North. I am sure that if that statement is true, the chairman of the committee would not feel that the balance of the appropriation—the estimate is made by Assistant Secretary Galloway—for farm-management demonstration, $138,430, is sufficient for this work in the North. I therefore in my amendment propose to strike out the $400,000 and the wording "for farm-demonstration work," and make it $250,000. That would cover the improved methods of farm management, farm practice, and the administration work, if it be determined that it should not come out of the demonstration money for the North, and then insert "$400,000 to be used in this demonstration work outside of the cotton-belt States."

Mr. President, this farm-demonstration work, I think it is agreed by everybody, is not a waste of money. Anything that helps to raise larger crops, to bring about prosperity of the agricultural classes, enters into the problem that we are all studying, the high cost of living, and redounds to the general prosperity of the Nation.

The Secretary of Agriculture sent out, in reply to inquiries, bulletins as to farm demonstration work and also sent out demonstrators to different counties. The expense of that work is borne partially by the counties and partially by the General Government. The best men, I think, receive about $2,400 a year, of which $100 a month is contributed by the county and $100 a month by the Government.

I have here a map, which I have had prepared, which shows the demands that are made from the various counties throughout the United States for these demonstrators. I can not put it into the RECORD, though I wish I might. In green here are indicated counties that have applied and can not have a demonstrator because of lack of funds, and in red the counties that have now a demonstrator. I find that in the State of Alabama, for instance, there is only one county in green. That means that there is only one county in the State of Alabama that does not have a farm demonstrator paid in part by the Government. The State of South Carolina—and I am sorry my distinguished agricultural friend from that State [Mr. SMITH] is not here—has one county in green; that is, only one county in that State has not a demonstrator paid in part by the Government. So the 15 Southern States have been very well taken care of in that respect, and I am glad of it; I am not raising any question about it at all. In the North anyone who will glance at this map will find that county after county in the various States in the North has applied for these farm demonstrators and have not been able to get them because there were no funds available for the purpose. I have letters here in my desk from various counties in my State, written to the Department of Agriculture, where they have organized their county associations, their rural clubs, their boys' and girls' clubs in the county, and yet have not been able to get a demonstrator.

In the 33 Northern and Western States there have been applications from 294 counties offering to contribute at the rate of $100 a month for a demonstrator, which would require $352,800. In the 33 Northern States there are now 125 demonstrators taken care of by this joint process between the county and the State and the United States Government. The amount necessary to carry on that work is $147,600.

Then there are a number of counties where the county organization is carrying on the work and the Government furnishing one dollar, so that the man may have the badge of governmental employment. To carry on the work in those 56 counties would require $67,200, making a total needed to carry on this work, which is now asked in the Northern States, of $537,600. I am not asking for that much, Mr. President, but am asking for $400,000.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. Can the Senator inform us as to the number of farms in the Southern States that are now under the supervision of public demonstrators?

Mr. KENYON. I did not catch the Senator's question.

Mr. POMERENE. Can the Senator inform us as to the number of farms that are now under Federal supervision?

Mr. KENYON. I can not. I do not think they manage it by farms.

Mr. POMERENE. About two years ago, in a conversation I had with the former Secretary of Agriculture, he stated to me that at that time his department had in charge 60,000 farms in the South. There were at that time no farms, as I understand, in Ohio under the control of the Federal Agricultural Department.

Mr. KENYON. That may be true.

Mr. JONES. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to interrupt him merely for a moment?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. I understood the Senator to say that it would require some five hundred and odd thousand dollars to carry on the work that has been applied for. That, as I understand, is aside from the money that would be necessary to be contributed by local authorities.

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. JONES. That would be the amount to be put up by the National Government?

Mr. KENYON. That would be the amount that the Government would contribute to this work.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Iowa speaks of 33 Northern States. In what group of States does he place Missouri?

Mr. KENYON. As one of the Northern States. I was not accurate perhaps in saying "Northern States"; I should have said the 15 Southern States that are taken are all under this particular appropriation. Then the balance of the country, the 33 States, includes New Mexico and Arizona, which would not be Northern States.

Mr. STONE. Missouri lies somewhat in the twilight zone between the North and the South, while we produce on our farms substantially the same character of crops as are produced in Iowa, Kansas, and other States of the North.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; but not so much of them.

Mr. STONE. Well, not so much of some of the crops. We do not produce as much corn, for example, as is produced in the Senator's State of Iowa, but we produce quite a good deal of cotton in my State. I do not know just where Missouri would be placed.

Mr. KENYON. The 15 States where this appropriation is now expended are the States of Maryland, West Virginia, Kentucky, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Arkansas, Louisiana, Oklahoma, and Texas. The balance are what I term "the Northern States." I want to say to the Senator from Missouri that there are applications on file from 13 counties in Missouri for such a demonstrator, and you have in Missouri 10 counties now that are supplied.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, before the Senator proceeds, I should like to ask this question: In a great many of the States is it not possible that the counties do not have these demonstrators because of the fact that they are not willing to furnish their part of the money?

Mr. KENYON. I think not, Mr. President. The counties, so far as my observation goes, are all anxious to furnish the money. They are, I know, in my State.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, if the Senator from Iowa will yield to me, that is not the situation in Kentucky. While the Senator states that the 15 Southern States are very well taken care of so far as farm demonstration work is concerned in this appropriation of six hundred and forty-odd thousand dollars, that is not true as to Kentucky. There are more than 20 counties in Kentucky now that have the amount required and desire a demonstration agent, but the Government has not sufficient funds for the purpose. Assistant Secretary Galloway informed me that he thought this appropriation ought to be increased, so that Kentucky, Maryland, and West Virginia could have an additional amount, and I have an amendment here to increase the amount $50,000.

Mr. KENYON. I want to say to the Senator from Kentucky it is certainly true that Kentucky, West Virginia, and Maryland have fared very illy as compared with the remainder of the Southern States.

Mr. JAMES. There is no question about that. Kentucky has only a $20,000 appropriation, while some of the other States have an appropriation of forty or fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, the State of Georgia is not much more than half covered, is it?

Mr. KENYON. The State of Georgia has fared fairly well. It is just about half covered, I should judge.

Mr. JAMES. The State of Georgia now receives $49,000 under this appropriation while the State of Kentucky receives only $22,000, the State of West Virginia only $17,000, and the State of Maryland only $18,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. What has North Carolina?

Mr. JAMES. North Carolina has $38,000. I will say that I am not criticizing the amendment. I intend to support the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I want the Senator to understand that my remarks are not in any spirit of criticism toward the appropriation for the South; the South ought to have it.

Mr. JAMES. I understand that.

Mr. KENYON. I want to put into the RECORD some figures at the present time. The State of Nebraska has applications on file from 32 counties for a farm-demonstration agent, which would require $38,400, at the rate of $100 per county per month. No funds are available.

The State of Indiana has applications from counties that would require an outlay of $22,800, and there are no funds available for that purpose; the State of Illinois has applications from counties, and it would require $44,400 to take care of their wants; the State of Missouri has applications from counties that would require $16,800.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I want to inquire——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. KERN. I want to inquire whether this calculation implies that the appropriation of $100 a month is to continue throughout the 12 months of the year?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. KERN. Is demonstration work done in the wintertime? I am only asking for information; I know nothing about the matter myself.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; the appropriation is made to carry on the work for such time as the Department of Agriculture may deem necessary. I think it is fixed on an average.

Mr. KERN. I wondered whether the Senator's estimate was not a little extravagant in that it seemed to contemplate a continuous service throughout the year at $100 a month.

Mr. KENYON. They do carry on a continuous service throughout the year in very many instances. Certainly some work can be done in winter as well as in summer, although that is not true as to all classes of work.

The State of Colorado has applications that would require $10,800; Kansas, $21,600; Iowa, $28,800; Michigan, $48,000; Pennsylvania, $27,600; New York, $22,800; Connecticut, $7,200.

Mr. BURTON. What has Ohio?

Mr. KENYON. Ohio has applications pending that would require $8,400.

Now, Mr. President, I have the amount available for the 15 Southern States tabulated here. The tabulation is in error only as relating to the amendment adopted a few days ago reducing the amount to $50,000 instead of $100,000, but that would give us funds available for demonstration work in the 15 Southern States of $928,240, less the $50,000, by which the appropriation was reduced, which would be an average per State of $61,883; while for the demonstration work of the 33 Northern States the estimate submitted by the Secretary of Agriculture is $138,430, which the House increased by $34,480; for demonstration on reclamation projects, $50,000; funds available through Smith-Lever bill $330,000, making $552,910, or an average per State of $16,754.85.

I ask to have this tabulation made a part of my remarks without fully going into it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, permission to do so is granted.

The table referred to is as follows:

Funds available for demonstration work in the United States Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year 1915.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa again explain what the green markings on his map indicate?

Mr. KENYON. The green markings on the map which I have at my desk are the counties which have made application to the Department of Agriculture for a farm demonstrator. The red markings with a "1" drawn in them are the counties where $1 is paid by the Government. The counties entirely in red are where the Government furnishes one-half or a substantial amount of the sum expended.

Mr. McCUMBER. What does the Senator say with reference to $1 being paid by the Government?

Mr. KENYON. I say that in many instances the Government, not having sufficient funds to pay one-half of the expense, contributes $1. There are, I think, 56 counties in the 33 Northern States where $1 is contributed by the Government.

Mr. McCUMBER. How is that indicated on the map?

Mr. KENYON. In red with a black line drawn through it.

Mr. WARREN. For what purpose do they contribute the $1?

Mr. KENYON. In the State of the Senator from North Dakota there are eight counties where the Government pays $1 and the county organization pays the balance. There are certain benefits that come to them from that payment.

Mr. McCUMBER. In other words, out of this appropriation my entire State gets $8, does it?

Mr. KENYON. The Senator's State gets $8 plus.

Mr. McCUMBER. Plus what?

Mr. KENYON. Plus nine counties where the Government pays $100 per month.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is, then, $908. And how much does Alabama receive?

Mr. KENYON. Every county except one receives such aid there.

Mr. McCUMBER. How much does it amount to in appropriations?

Mr. KENYON. I can not count all of those counties, unless the Senator will wait.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thought the Senator had the figures there.

Mr. KENYON. These are only the figures for the Northern States. Every county in Alabama except one has a county agent some substantial part of whose salary is paid by the Government, although not in every instance $100 a month.

Mr. McCUMBER. I could not help but note, Mr. President, as I looked over the map, the special coloring to indicate that while, as stated by the Senator, the State of North Dakota, which is agricultural throughout and has more acres of agricultural land, perhaps four times over, than any one of those Southern States, gets $908, while the Southern States get from fifty to sixty thousand dollars. It is along the same line as the vote that was given the other day upon a matter that was very interesting to the people of my State.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator is a trifle in error. I dislike to spoil his argument, but the $908 would be per month, so the Senator will have to multiply that by 12, making $10,896.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think he would have to multiply it by 3 and not by 12.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, it ought also to be stated that the amount used by the Southern States is used not only for farm demonstration work but for the purpose of destroying the boll weevil in the cotton fields.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky, because I have tried to get at that heretofore, is any part of that appropriation used for the eradication of the boll weevil? In the discussion in the House it seems to have been accepted that none of it was used as to the boll weevil, but that the entire appropriation was to be used in farm demonstration work. The demonstrator teaches the farmer to raise more potatoes, more cotton, more of everything that comes from the soil, and does not in any way devote himself to combating the boll weevil. That is as I understand it. I do not know as to that; I have been trying to find out.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if most of the money so used in the Southern States does not come from what is known as the southern educational board?

Mr. KENYON. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars does come from that board; but an amendment has been adopted here to prevent that.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what I understand.

Mr. KENYON. And the appropriation has been increased $250,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. For that purpose; to take the place of that heretofore received from the southern educational board.

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from North Dakota was complaining that there was more money spent in the States of the South than was spent in his State. That money has been derived principally from the fund supplied by the southern educational board, as I understand.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; that money has come from the Rockefeller interests and some of the trusts in an attempt to untaint their money.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to correct the Senator from North Carolina. I was not complaining at all; I have become used to that treatment, and have no complaint to make.

Mr. JAMES. The provision in the bill states that this fund is to be used, among other things, for the purpose of demonstrating "the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton-boll weevil." My understanding is that it has been used to a great extent for that purpose.

Mr. KENYON. I think the Senator will find that a very small part of it has been so used.

Mr. JAMES. I personally know nothing about it; I merely give my information.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has indicated that many applications have been made for demonstration work which have not been honored because of lack of funds.

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. Now, I ask the Senator what rule is adopted by the Agricultural Department for the distribution of this fund when it is not sufficient to meet the requirements of all the applicants?

Mr. KENYON. As I understand, it rests entirely in the good judgment and wise discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture. My State has only been able to have six demonstrators, not including one to whom the Government pays $1.

Mr. POMERENE. By what principle is the department controlled in distributing this fund?

Mr. KENYON. I can not tell the Senator.

Mr. STONE. It is complimentary to the States of Iowa and Ohio that they are so well advanced that they do not so much need instruction.

Mr. KENYON. We have not applied for so much as Missouri; that is true.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. KERN. There is undoubtedly much truth in what has been suggested by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I observe from the map referred to by the Senator from Iowa that my native county in Indiana, which is up to date and abreast of the times in all agricultural movements, has not made application and has received nothing. I understand why that is. It has soil that is naturally rich and inexhaustible, the farmers are up to date, and do not need any farm demonstration. By and by, when their lands become impoverished and the young generation has forgotten the principles of agriculture, they may apply for aid. I think that is true of the State of North Dakota and the new States. With their inexhaustible virgin soil they do not need farm demonstration as much as the older States, where the soil is worn out.

Mr. KENYON. I entirely agree with the Senator; but even in those States there is a great work being done along the line proposed. I wish to read a portion of a letter I received a few days ago from the State of Iowa with reference to this matter. I will ask the Senator from Indiana to listen to this letter; it is really a good letter, and I think the Senator will enjoy it. It has reference to this work and to what they are doing in the new States, as he terms them. I will not read it all, but will read a part of it, as follows:

Our county agent, Prof. Wise—

He was paid by the county; there were no funds from the Government—

Our county agent, Prof. L. O. Wise, has accomplished a great deal in the county during the year, far more than we had expected. He is in a position now, because of his acquaintance with the farmers and with the needs of the community, and because of the work done, and because of the work to be done, to put the work on a permanent basis and demonstrate the value of organized effort in the matter of bettering farm-life conditions and the making for better country homes, in the development of a rural social life that will permit of intelligent interest and community growth.

* * * * * * *

Through this department a keener interest has been aroused in better farming, better rural organization, better country schools, better live stock and grain, better roads, and better country churches. Much work has been done along the lines of increasing the use and growth of alfalfa and clover. Extended efforts have been put forth in beautifying the farm home and properly environing the child life of the rural communities.

This department vaccinated over 6,000 hogs, gave material assistance to several veterinarians, thus saving large numbers of hogs to the farmers of the county and giving actual demonstration of the benefits of the serum treatment.

Mr. Wise, through our association, conducted a series of farmers' short courses, in which was given careful and thoughtful instruction in the principles underlying successful farm practices and home making. About 900 men and boys received this instruction, and about 200 women. Four good working rural-life clubs were organized during these short courses in addition to those that were already organized. An interest in rural community life has been aroused, the influence of which will have a wholesome effect upon the lives of the people in the community.

So the Senator can see that this farm-demonstration work, even in the newer States, goes to the question of better homes and better schools and better churches and better citizenship, and is a splendid work for the Government to help on.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I wish to add that I was only trying to suggest a reason why applications have not been made from certain quarters.

Mr. KENYON. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. BRADY. I wish to ask the Senator to name the counties shown in different colors on the map, and let us know why they are colored differently, and what their position is relative to this work. The Senator can just hold up the map so that other Senators can see it, if he will.

Mr. KENYON. I can not put the map in the RECORD; but if my distinguished friend from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] will hold one end of the map, I shall endeavor to explain it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. KENYON. The unit is a county. The green areas are the counties where application has been made for a county demonstrator.

Mr. STONE. But not granted.

Mr. KENYON. But where there are no funds to pay one and the application has not been granted. The red areas with the black lines through them are the counties where applications have been made and the agent has been sent to these counties, but is paid $1 by the Government and the balance by the county organization. The counties in red are where the agent is sent by the Government upon application, and the cost of that is divided between the Government and the county in some ratio which the Secretary of Agriculture may determine, not always the same. Is that clear to the Senator?

Mr. BRADY. The explanation is entirely satisfactory; but I notice the coloring on the State of Indiana. Does that indicate that counties of that State have made application, or that they are using funds now?

Mr. KENYON. Indiana, I think, is about evenly divided. The green area indicates the counties where they have applied for this agent, but there are no funds; while the red area, with the black line through it, indicates that a large number of counties in Indiana have a Government agent paid $1 by the Government and the balance by the county organization. In fact, Indiana has no agent to which the Government contributes any substantial part of his salary.

Mr. WEST. And the white area is where no application has been made?

Mr. KENYON. Where no application has been made.

Mr. BRADY. The counties in green are those where the Government pays $1 and the counties have made application, as I understand, for this fund?

Mr. KENYON. The Senator is right.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, why is it that Alabama and South Carolina have had such abundant use of this fund over almost every other State?

Mr. KENYON. Because they were just a little more alert, I think, than Georgia. I know of no other reason.

Mr. JAMES. Because they have had good members on the Agricultural Committee.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa further yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. KERN. I should like to see if we can get a clear understanding of the purpose of the Senator's amendment. I understand that because $628,240 is appropriated for the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the boll weevil, therefore the use of the $400,000 that is provided to investigate and encourage the adoption of improved methods of farm management, and so forth, should be confined to the States outside the cotton belt?

Mr. KENYON. If the Senator will permit me, the $628,240 is money that is used for farm demonstration work in the boll-weevil States. It is not used to exterminate the boll weevil. In the Senator will read the hearings in the House, he will discover that that is true. That amount of $628,240 is to be used for farm demonstration work in these 15 States, and that is according to the policy of the department.

Mr. KERN. I call the Senator's attention, however, to the difference in the language. The language referring to the 15 States is:

For farmers' cooperative demonstrations and for the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton boll weevil, $628,240.

The language of the other section, which applies to the Northern States, is:

To investigate and encourage the adoption of improved methods of farm management and farm practice, and for farm demonstration work, $400,000.

I call the Senator's attention to the fact that no provision is made, in the appropriation for the cotton States, for the investigation and encouragement of improved methods of farm management and farm practice.

Mr. KENYON. Why, no. That comes out of the $400,000 just as much for the Southern States as for the Northern States. That is the exact point I was trying to make.

Mr. KERN. How is that provided? What is the language of the Senator's amendment?

Mr. KENYON. I strike out, by my amendment, in lines 18 and 19, "and for farm demonstration work, $400,000" and insert "$250,000." Then, at the close of the paragraph, at the end of line 22, I insert "for farm demonstration work outside of the cotton-belt States, $400,000."

Mr. GORE. Mr President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. KENYON. I do, if the Senator from Indiana is through.

Mr. GORE. I wish to say, in that connection, that only $32,000 of this $400,000 appropriation is expended in the Southern States. The rest goes to other States. I thought that statement ought to go into the RECORD at this time.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator is correct in part. In the hearings before the House committee the $33,000 of which he speaks was shown as spent in the Southern States; but $23,935 of that $400,000 goes for administration. Now, what is that for? It is spent here in Washington, but it is spent for the South as well as for the North. For farm economics, $53,000 is expended; for special farm studies, $42,000; for farm-management field studies, $98,000. That is spent in the South just as much as it is in the North.

Mr. GORE. Of course the South would be chargeable with its ratable share of the administration expenses, something like between two and three thousand dollars.

Mr. KENYON. The point I am making—and I do not think the Senator and I disagree about it—is that in the estimate of Dr. Galloway, which was submitted for farm-management demonstration, out of this $400,000 he estimates $138,430, and that is all there is to use for farm demonstration work in the North, in the 33 States.

Mr. GORE, Mr. WORKS, and Mr. JAMES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield, and to whom?

Mr. KENYON. I yield first to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I should like to complete the statement at that juncture. The House added $34,000 to that.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. GORE. Raising it to $170,000.

Mr. KENYON. That is correct. I omitted to say that.

I now yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa how much is being expended or is authorized now for farm demonstration work by existing statutes, independent of the appropriation bills?

Mr. KENYON. The allotment for 1914 in the Northern States, which included a number of things I have suggested that are not used for farm demonstration work, is $375,000. In the South, as I understand, it was approximately $378,000, carried by the Agricultural appropriation bill. I am not absolutely certain of that, however.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator is now referring to previous appropriation bills. I was referring to independent statutes.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will permit me, there are no permanent statutes that carry anything for demonstration as understood there. The permanent appropriations provided by statutes, such as the Morrill and Hatch bills, go in certain amounts to each State and are for experimental colleges and work; but that money is not expended like this. This money is expended in conjunction with the county authorities in each county, and it is only provided for from time to time in each appropriation bill.

Mr. WORKS. I was not asking how it was expended. I was trying to get at the amount of money that the Government is expending now for this purpose. I remember that not very long ago a bill passed the Senate, which, I think, had already passed the House, authorizing the expenditure of some $3,000,000 a year for farm demonstration work.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. GORE. That was not identical with this appropriation, nor was it devoted entirely to the same purpose. It was to be used in connection with the agricultural and mechanical colleges of the several States. Of course none of that money has been utilized as yet. That is the farm extension work in connection with the agricultural colleges. I think, however, it will soon supersede the work provided for under this appropriation.

Mr. WORKS. I think if this bill is examined it will be found that there are about four different appropriations in the bill, in different forms, for farm demonstration work, and we have independent statutes here providing for the same thing. It does not make very much difference how it is expended, whether it is under the direction of colleges or in some other way; it is all being expended for the same purpose.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. JAMES. I notice that the Senator's amendment reads:

For farm-demonstration work outside of the cotton belt, $400,000.

What does the Senator mean by "the cotton belt"?

Mr. KENYON. I am leaving that to the Secretary of Agriculture. I assume that he will have no trouble in knowing what we mean. My own thought is that that covers the States outside of those in which the appropriation is used for the extermination of the boll weevil.

Mr. JAMES. Cotton is grown in Kentucky in the southwestern part of the State.

Mr. KENYON. I think Kentucky would be in the cotton belt. The 15 States that are now considered by the Secretary in expending the appropriation for farm-demonstration work that is made especially for exterminating the boll weevil are the States that would be included in the cotton belt. I am content, however, to leave that to the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. STONE. We grow as much cotton in Missouri as they do in some other States.

Mr. KENYON. Oh, there is everything in Missouri.

Mr. OVERMAN. The State of Missouri raises 1,000 bales, and we raise 1,000,000.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I wish to state, for the information of the Senator——

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will pardon me a moment before I take my seat, would that place Missouri in the cotton belt?

Mr. KENYON. No; it would place Missouri in the 33 States that will use this appropriation.

Mr. WEST. I wish to state to the Senator from Iowa that, according to the last statistics, that I noticed Missouri, in proportion to acreage, raised more cotton than any other State in the Union.

Mr. JAMES. That was not true according to the other census, because Kentucky did that. We have very fertile land down there on the Mississippi River.

Mr. WEST. I am simply citing the last statistics I know of.

Mr. OVERMAN. The last statistics show that North Carolina raises more cotton to the acre than any other State of the Union.

Mr. GORE. I would suggest Missouri, North Carolina, and Kentucky.

Mr. JAMES. Let us include Oklahoma.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I wish to remind the Senate that the State of California is growing the best cotton that is raised at the present time, and more of it to the acre than any other State in the Union.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I just want to place a couple of matters in the RECORD, and then I will cease. I have tried to make myself clear. I do not know that I have.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me a moment, the matter is not clear to me. I am speaking now in the utmost seriousness. I understand an appropriation is provided in this bill of six hundred and odd thousand dollars to be used for the eradication of the boll weevil.

Mr. KENYON. For farm demonstration work and the eradication of the boll weevil, and that fund is used for farm-demonstration work in the boll weevil territory, the method of exterminating the boll weevil being considered a part of the farm-demonstration work.

Mr. STONE. Six hundred and odd thousand dollars, then, is assigned to the cotton States?

Mr. KENYON. To 15 States.

Mr. STONE. Fifteen States for farm-demonstration work, which embraces the boll-weevil inquiry?

Mr. KENYON. That is correct.

Mr. STONE. In addition to that, according to the Senator's amendment, he would set apart $250,000 for farm-demonstration work?

Mr. KENYON. No; the Senator is in error there; not for farm-demonstration work.

Mr. STONE. What for?

Mr. KENYON. For the same things that now are taken out of the $400,000, which are these: Administration—that is, the expenses of the work here in Washington—farm economics, special farm studies, study of farm management, field studies, and utilization of cacti and other dry-land plants.

That is all taken out of the original $400,000. I want to have enough money to cover that and have it separate and distinct from the farm demonstration. That is where we get confused. The $250,000 covers all that. That is used North and South alike. Then the $400,000 is to be used in the 33 States of the Union outside of the 15 States where the $628,000 is used.

Is it clear to the Senator now?

Mr. STONE. I think I understand it.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. THOMPSON. The Senator's amendment does not contemplate disturbing the $628,000?

Mr. KENYON. Not at all.

Mr. JAMES. I have an amendment to increase it.

Mr. KENYON. I do not want to be understood as saying a word against that appropriation.

Mr. THOMPSON. In short, then, it simply embraces an increase of $250,000?

Mr. KENYON. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. THOMPSON. For the special work which the Senator has in mind for the Northern States?

Mr. KENYON. Yes; it gives to these 33 States the use of $400,000 for farm-demonstration work and gives $250.000 to the department, which will be used in all this other work, and $628.000 to these 15 Southern States for their farm-demonstration work and the boll-weevil work.

I ask to place in the RECORD a summary, which I send to the desk, and also a plan of farm-demonstration work in the Northern and Western States, which was prepared by the Department of Agriculture and which I think may be of interest to those who will read the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENYON. That is all I have to say.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Character of investigations conducted under the authorization contained in the Agricultural bill in the following language (see p. 20, lines 17 and 18, of H. R. 13679, as presented to Senate, 1914): "To investigate and encourage the adoption of improved methods of farm management and farm practice."

1. Investigations on the cost of production of all classes of farm products.

2. Investigation of the profits from farming in the various agricultural sections of the country and from the various types of farming and on farms of different sizes.

3. The working out of systems of farm organization that will result in increased production and increased profits in farming.

4. Determining the factors that affect the yield of crops.

5. Determining the various sections of the country in which economic conditions are most favorable to the production of the various crops and types of live stock.

6. Determining the best types of farms for every section of the country and working out the most efficient organization for each of these types of farming for farms of different sizes.

7. Determining the character and cost of adequate equipment on farms of different types.

8. Determining the amount of labor required in the management of properly organized farms and farm households.

PLAN OF DEMONSTRATION WORK IN THE NORTHERN AND WESTERN STATES.

The demonstration work as carried on by the Office of Farm Management in the Northern and Western States is carried on (1) with adults and (2) with boys and girls through club work.

In the adult work men thoroughly trained in both the science and practice of agriculture are located permanently in areas the size of a county, where they cooperate with the farmers of the county in the study of the agricultural problems and their solution. These men are known as county agricultural agents. The agent brings to the farmer on his own farm the results of scientific investigations in agriculture and the experiences of successful farmers, and helps the farmer put them into practice. His prime mission is to secure to the farmers a greater net income at the end of the year, while at the same time maintaining the integrity of the soil, the proper standard of living, and the consequent betterment of the social life of the county.

The thought uppermost in the demonstration work is to get as many farmers as possible to undertake some line of agricultural improvement on their own farms, and thus learn better agriculture by actually doing it.

LOCAL STUDIES.

In taking up work in a county the agent familiarizes himself with the kinds of soil and types of farming that are being carried on in each section of the county, the income that farmers are getting, and the crops, stock, and farm organization that seem to be best adapted to the various sections of the county. The agent first finds out what the agriculture of the county really is and what the farmers need before he undertakes any extensive demonstration work for the improvement of agricultural conditions.

With such studies as these for a basis the agent is fortified to take up advisory and demonstration work with the farmers along the lines that promise greatest helpfulness.

AGENT COORDINATES LOCAL AGRICULTURAL AGENCIES.

In nearly every county the agent finds a number of agricultural agencies, such as the grange, cow-testing association, good-roads associations, farmers' clubs, cooperative purchasing and selling organizations, and the like, already organized. If possible, these various forces are coordinated so that all may work unitedly and progressively for the betterment of the agriculture of the county. Furthermore, the agent helps to organize such additional clubs, associations, and the like as may be required to meet specific agricultural needs of the county here and there. The aim is to have every farmer in the county working with others in groups for the upbuilding of the agriculture of the county. Individuals within these organizations are solicited to undertake definite lines of agricultural improvement on their own farms.

AGENT DEVELOPS LOCAL LEADERSHIP.

One of the largest functions of the county agent is to develop local leadership. The task of improving the agriculture of an entire county is so great that the agent has a very large function to perform as an executive or administrator. It is his duty to inspire leadership and accept the help of voluntary assistants in the work. Only in this way can he hope effectively to reach the farmers of the entire county.

TAKES FARM PROBLEMS TO SCIENTISTS.

The agent also acts as the connecting link between the scientific or research work of the State and Nation and the farmer, not only presenting the results of investigations in such a way that they may be useful to the farmers, but calling the attention of research institutions to the local agricultural problems of the county and soliciting the assistance of scientists in helping solve the local problems. The agent has an important function to perform in suggesting and helping make efficient any research work that may be undertaken by the State or Nation in the county.

COMMON CARRIER OF IDEAS.

The agent, through his visits to farmers throughout the county, soon learns the most successful practices of the county and spreads the knowledge of these to all farmers. He is sometimes referred to as a common carrier of ideas.

AGENT ACTS AS ADVISER.

The agent's previous training, together with his local studies, enables him to advise with farmers helpfully along the lines of spraying, seed treatment, fertilizers, control of insect pests, cultural and stock practices, and other miscellaneous matters, and it is along these lines that he is usually first called upon for assistance in the county. But his primary value to the county follows as a result of his analytical studies of the farming of the county, his coordinating and organizing ability, his inspiration, development of local leadership, and his advocacy of lines of agriculture which local study shows are sound for the county.

In getting the results of the agent's studies and conclusions before the agricultural interests of the county, free use is made of the local press, lectures, institutes, circulars, short courses of instruction, and personal interviews.

BOYS' AND GIRLS' CLUB WORK.

The boys' and girls' club work is carried on in cooperation with the schools of the county, with the assistance of the State and county superintendents and the principals and teachers in public schools. The aim in this work is to teach the boys and girls the best known practices in agriculture on a limited area of ground, with the idea of interesting them in farm and home opportunities and achievements. The boys and girls are taught to do a concrete piece of constructive work throughout an entire season and keep a correct financial record of the cost and returns. Emphasis in the girls' garden and canning club work is placed on the utilization of the waste products of the farm by means of preserving and canning by modern processes, and thus contributing directly to the welfare of the household and the pocket money of the boys and girls who undertake it.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment, which I hope the Senator from Iowa will accept. On line 5 of the amendment, after the words "for farm demonstration work," I move to insert "and for conducting boys' and girls' clubs." This will enable the department, if they so desire, to use part of this money for boys' and girls' clubs. In many places the work is conducted by the men who do the demonstration work.

In this connection I wish to have printed in the RECORD the annual report for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1912, and ending June 30, 1913, for the Northern, Central, and Western States. It is a report made by the superintendent in charge. This report contains valuable information, which I think will be beneficial to Senators.

As an illustration, in the State of Idaho we had no clubs whatever in 1911, and to-day there are 15,000 members in the boys' and girls' clubs of Idaho. The report shows the splendid work that is being done in this department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the matter submitted by the Senator from Idaho will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

BOYS' AND GIRLS' CLUB WORK.

(Annual report for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1912, and ending June 30, 1913, for the Northern, Central, and Western States.)

SECTION OF FIELD STUDIES AND DEMONSTRATIONS, OFFICE OF FARM MANAGEMENT.

During the past year we have employed six State cooperative agents in charge of club work and have had the assistance of five collaborators in the conduct of the club work. Owing to the lack of funds to meet the demand for the boys' and girls' club work, it has been necessary to seek both direct and indirect cooperation through the public-school teachers, county superintendents, State superintendents of public instruction, federated women's clubs, chambers of commerce, granges, and other kindred organizations for the purpose of getting the boys and girls organized and locally supervised during the year.

At the present time six additional States have made application for financial aid in order that they might put into the field a State cooperative agent in charge of club work. The greatest need of the boys' and girls' club work is definite leadership and some one to do the "follow-up" work in each State. Success in club work depends almost entirely upon a carefully planned system of printed "follow-up" instruction and personal leadership, field meetings, visitations, etc.

The State, district, and county agents in the demonstration work have given considerable cooperation and valuable help in this work, but so little of the territory is properly equipped with these State, district, and local leaders we must depend almost entirely upon the unpaid leadership through the schools.

At the close of the cropping season of 1912 we had a total enrollment of 22,000 boys and girls in our territory. At the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, we had a total enrollment of 60,000. About 25,000 of these are handled directly from the Office of Farm Management. The remainder are handled through the State leaders and through the extension departments of the colleges of agriculture. We furnish from the Office of Farm Management on the average eight pieces of specially prepared "follow-up" instructions to each club member enrolled during the season, thus making a total of approximately 640,000 sheet circulars or bulletins of instruction furnished in a year's time to the club membership.

The following club activities have been systematically organized and promoted during the fiscal year: Boys' corn clubs on the acre basis; girls' garden and canning clubs, based upon one-tenth of an acre of tomatoes and the canning of the surplus products; potato clubs, requiring the growing of one-eighth acre of potatoes, selecting seed potatoes from the hill, grading and crating seed potatoes, grading and crating market potatoes, and reducing the culls to potato starch; vacation canning and marketing clubs, which have to do especially with the elimination of the wastes of garden, orchard, and field by means of the little portable home canners, and teaching the club members how to find a market for their surplus products, both fresh and canned (in this arrangements are now under way to cooperate with the Bureau of Markets in the furnishing of suitable instructions on marketing); sugar-beet clubs, based upon the growing of an acre of sugar beets as applied especially to the irrigated lands of the West. Poultry clubs, vegetable-garden clubs, good-road clubs, etc., are being conducted in cooperation with the office and State departments whose special function it is to promote these activities.

Wherever the garden and canning-club interests were promoted an effort was made to always interest the mother with the daughter in the canning activities. At one school of instruction in Colorado in the interest of canning through the garden and canning-club work 380 women were present to take the instruction with the girls.

The agriculturist in charge of club work has delivered 126 public addresses, 21 canning demonstrations, and 14 field meetings in the States during the year. All canning demonstrations were conducted for the direct benefit of the club members, but a general invitation was extended to the public; the "cold pack" method of canning by use of the five distinct types of home portable canners was used to demonstrate the use of all types of containers in the canning of corn, greens, fruits, and vegetables; time and labor saving as well as efficiency were important factors in the work.

In all States where cooperative arrangements have been perfected for the promotion and conduct of the club work the cooperating agency furnishes one-half of salary and expenses and the Bureau of Plant Industry, through the Office of Farm Management, furnishes the other half.

The spirit of cooperation as well as the real understanding of teamwork between the State officials and institutions is growing daily. When the work was first started in the North every one of the cooperating institutions objected to suggestions, instructions, helps, etc., from this office. None of them cared to make reports or furnish our office with club enrollments. At the present time their attitude has been completely changed, and all are making reports, not only asking for help and instructions but urging us to come into the States to assist them in doing the "job." During the fiscal year we have only been able to fill about 10 per cent of the requests for help and instructions which have come in from the States.

The need for a broad, constructive club work in the Northern, Central, and Western States is certainly urgent and the opportunity fully as large as it has been in the cotton States of the South.

The total amount expended by the Office of Farm Management for club work in the 33 Northern States during the fiscal year was $12,000, and a smaller amount is available for the new fiscal year. Eight new States have made application for financial cooperation in the conduct of club work, and have already met all requirements, financial and otherwise, but lack of funds prevents this office from giving them the necessary assistance. No branch of agricultural work is in greater need of definite leadership in the States. Lack of leadership means defeat to the work and no definite results. We would recommend that a State agent in charge of club work, with a lady assistant, be provided for in cooperation with the State organization as soon as possible.

Fifty-two circulars, outlines, and special sheets of instruction were prepared and sent out to the club enrollment from time to time as a system of follow-up instruction, bearing directly upon the conduct and management of crops in their club work. The instructions were prepared in cooperation with the various departments, offices, and State institutions in charge of and interested in the special subjects under consideration.

All money expended for the encouragement of the boys' and girls' club work by way of prizes, premiums, and awards are furnished by the local people, and in no case does the Office of Farm Management furnish the funds for this purpose.

With proper encouragement the boys' and girls' clubs of the Northern, Central, and Western States will at least double their enrollment during the year 1914.

Mr. BRADY. This report demonstrates what has been done; and with this added appropriation there is no question but that the club memberships in the Northern, Central, and Western States can be doubled during the year 1914.

I hope the Senator from Iowa will not object to this amendment, giving the boys and girls' clubs the advantage of this appropriation. It means much to the Northern, Central, and Western States.

Mr. KENYON. I have no objection to the amendment. I think that is work that is embraced within the general farm-demonstration work.

Mr. BRADY. But it should be specified here also, for the reason that in this way the boys and girls' clubs can use this money if the department desires to have them do so.

Mr. KENYON. I have no objection to that. I accept the amendment as an amendment to the one offered by me.

There is just one thing more I should like to put in the RECORD, and that is a statement showing the different counties and States which have applied for aid, and what they have received, and the general amounts that will be necessary to grant what they desire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator did not intend that his remarks should be viewed in any sectional light and that he did not intend to give any sectional cast to the different appropriations contained in the bill. I am a little afraid, however, that the language used by some Senators might possibly be liable to that misconstruction. Therefore I feel that I ought to say a few words in regard to the history of this farm demonstration.

It originated some 12 or 14 years ago as a result of the invasion and ravages of the Mexican boll weevil. It came into the State of Texas from the Republic of Mexico, and in many counties, covering large sections, the production of cotton was reduced some 75 or 80 per cent. It gave rise to an exigency in the agricultural situation in that section. In order to meet that emergency a modest appropriation was made by Congress to enable the department to study the habits, history, and ravages of the boll weevil, and, if possible, to devise ways and means to counteract its ravages.

I think the first appropriation for the purpose was something like $75,000 or $100,000. Cultural methods were employed, and proved remarkably successful. The methods were so advantageous that it was decided to extend them to other States in anticipation of the coming of the boll weevil, to enable the farmers to adopt cultural methods by which they could meet and counteract the ravages of the boll weevil when he should make his advent, in case he should do so.

The system was extended throughout the entire cotton belt. It has proven of the most advantageous service not only in counteracting the boll weevil where he actually exists but in stimulating improved agriculture in the other Southern States where the boll weevil to this day has not come. The work proved so beneficial that it was afterwards decided to extend it to Northern States, although the crisis did not exist in the North and there was no acute emergency. Notwithstanding improved agriculture was practiced on a much more extended scale throughout the Northern States, it was hoped that these methods might nevertheless prove serviceable to that section.

During the last three or four years this work has been extended into the Northern States and other States than those situated in the cotton belt. It has been a matter of slow growth, a matter of evolution. It has not been the result of any disposition on the part of anyone to discriminate as between the different sections. I think that statement will be abundantly justified by simply recollecting the fact that this entire policy originated under a former administration—if I may say so, under a Republican administration. The first appropriations for the extermination of the boll weevil in the Southern States were generously made by a Congress that was Republican in both branches. The policy was introduced and extended by Secretary of Agriculture Wilson, from the State of the Senator from Iowa, and it is now being gradually extended throughout the entire Union. I regard it as a most valuable service. Indeed, I think it is one of the greatest services that the General Government renders to the private citizen.

This bill as it passed the House carried an appropriation of $400,000 for these different services in the North and West less $32,000, or, in other words, it carried an appropriation of $378,000 for demonstration and other work in the North, East, and West. The bill as it passed the House carried $378,000 for demonstration work in the Southern States. The appropriations were approximately the same. The Senate decided to divorce the General Government from the General Education Board. This required an additional appropriation in the Senate of $250,000.

It is largely the misfortune of the South that this appropriation was needed in that section. As the need was greater there the appropriation was greater there, just as we recently appropriated half a million dollars to counteract the ravages of hog cholera in the State of Ohio and the State of Iowa. Half a million dollars was appropriated owing to the misfortunes, the calamities, of those States, and not because of any disposition on anyone's part to show favoritism toward the State of Ohio or the State of Iowa.

I may say that $256,000 is carried by the pending bill for the extermination of many pests in New England; $246,000 is carried by it for the study of diseases and insects affecting cereals, largely grain, in the North and in the West.

When all these appropriations are considered it will be obvious to anyone that there has not only been no disposition to discriminate between different parts of the country, but there has actually been no discrimination practiced by the bill.

I felt that I ought to say this in justification of the committee and in vindication of the bill itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JAMES. I call up the amendment I introduced, on page 20.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky moves to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment, on line 25, page 20, was agreed to.

Mr. JAMES. It is to increase the appropriation $50,000 for the 15 Southern States. I do that for the reason that Kentucky, West Virginia, and Maryland have apportioned to them only the following sums: Eighteen thousand dollars to Maryland, $17,000 to West Virginia, and $22,000 to Kentucky, whereas Virginia has $38,000; North Carolina, $38,000; Georgia, $49,000; and Mississippi, $45,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, would it not be better to have the Secretary of Agriculture reapportion the amounts?

Mr. JAMES. I was just going to refer to that. I talked with the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, Dr. Galloway, who handles this fund, and he stated that this amount allotted to the Southern States was absolutely needed, but there was need for this additional sum, which, if allowed, would be allotted to these States. I know that in my own State of Kentucky, instead of six counties, as is shown by the map there, I was informed by the secretary of agriculture of our State, who came in to see me, that more than 20 counties now had raised the required amount of money to pay their half in connection with the half allotted by the Federal Government for the purpose of having a demonstration agent. Our State has now 15,000 boys and 1,000 girls in these canning clubs, and yet the State gets less than any other State in the South.

Dr. Galloway says this amount is needed, and I hope the Senate will adopt the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent, the vote whereby the committee amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered.

Mr. SMOOT. Would it not be just as well, then, to have an amendment increasing whatever amount they want for Kentucky, and to state specifically just what it is for?

Mr. JAMES. I just raise the amount $50,000, and of course I rely upon their good judgment and what they have already stated should be done, and that is that this is to be allotted to these three States. It is not the custom to allot by the bill itself money to the various States. For that reason I did not propose it. Of course that would be preferable, but that is not the custom and I have not asked that it be done. By my amendment I make a lump increase of $50,000, and feel sure that out of this sum Kentucky will be given a sufficient amount to carry on this work—in fact, Dr. Galloway assured me of this—and as no appropriation for farm demonstration work particularizes any State, I have not done so here.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want to ask some Senator who is acquainted with this work of what this demonstration consists?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it consists in an effort to take to the farmers the results and benefits of scientific agriculture. I may say the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] stated a few minutes ago he had seen a statement two or three years ago to the effect that there were some 60,000 farms in the South in the charge of the Government. The Senator was not accurate in his language. There are no farms in charge of the Government. In my own State we have one general superintendent of this farm demonstration work throughout the State. In some 40 or 50 counties out of the 77 counties they have selected a practical farmer who uses his own farm for demonstration purposes. They have this year succeeded in securing some 3,000 farmers to cultivate their entire farms according to methods prescribed by the department, or, in other words, upon the principles of improved agriculture, and some 12,000 other practical farmers have agreed to cultivate more or less of their farms in accordance with those principles. It is an effort to introduce upon the farms the information and the application of those principles which have been known in the department and in the colleges for a number of years. It is the one link necessary to complete the circuit in order to make scientific agriculture an actual fact and not a mere figure of speech in this country.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, of all the sops that were ever dished out for the American farmer, this demonstration sop is practically the worst. There is little or no benefit whatever to be derived from it. It is a waste of the money, the greater portion of which is paid by the farmers themselves.

I do not think there is an application from my State to have a demonstrator sent out there. I am glad to note it, because in all this Agricultural appropriation bill you are treating the American farmer as though he did not have as much sense as a 6-year-old child, and that you must have a demonstrator standing over him telling him how he is to plow his land, how he is to hitch his horses to the plow, how he is to stand behind the handles, how deep he is to plow, how he is to harrow, and how he is to cultivate it and thrash it.

If there is anything gained in the matter of scientific farming at all, it is in every one of our agricultural schools in our States. The Government is sending out an immense amount of literature upon the cultivation of every kind of plant and shrub known, describing how it should be cultivated, how it should be cared for in this State and in that State, in the dry country and in the arid and in the semiarid country. All the information any demonstrator could possibly give to any farmer is conveyed to him through these farmers' bulletins. There is not a farmer in my State who can not read and write, and there is not one who is not able to apply that knowledge, and if he has not the sense and the capacity to apply it, he will never have the sense and the capacity to follow the directions that are given him by any demonstrator.

I am not a bit surprised, Mr. President, that under the circumstances we should apply ourselves to seek the many devious ways by which we can spend money to benefit the farmer to offset the injury that we are doing him year in and year out without any attempt to give him any benefit whatever. The thing that is most interesting to the farmer is not how I can raise a crop, but what I can get for it after I have raised it; and when you open the floodgates of all the products of the entire world and turn them freely into the United States you are doing more damage to the American farmer than you would accomplish in good in ten thousand years with any such methods as you are here seeking to benefit him.

You had here before you testimony taken by volumes showing the losses the farmers are sustaining in the grades to their grain by reason of the inefficient and the unjust system by which the grain is handled. The farmers in my State alone will lose by their grades in a single year from three to four million dollars. Yet when they appeal to you for some practical benefit you are in your rooms outside of the Senate Chamber and refuse to listen to a single word; and then you come in finally, when you are called in upon a call of the Senate for a quorum, and you proceed to vote, giving him no benefit whatever, and then you turn over to him this thin sop to compensate him for the injury that you are committing against him.

I want to protest in the name of the western farmers, the intelligent farmers of the United States, that they are not blind to this action. They may not be able to see their remedy. Being unorganized and scattered promiscuously over the entire country and not addicted to writing letters or acting through an organized society, it may take them some time before they will be able to understand fully the cause of their discomfiture at your hands, but I believe, as sure as the God of truth reigns, that they will come to understand it fully some day and you will right the wrongs that you are committing against the American farmer.

Mr. President, there will be practically no benefit obtained out of these demonstrations. Send a little pamphlet out to any farmer in my State telling him the results of the experiments of the Agricultural Department of the United States and of the several agricultural colleges in the States as to the character of soils and the cultivation of this and that species of cereals and he does not need your demonstrator. The chances are 10 to 1 that he knows more about how to raise those crops and get the very best there is out of his soil than the demonstrator whom you send to him.

I know what this demonstration means. It means a great deal of human labor applied to the cultivation and the handling of the grain they are attempting to demonstrate. The Government has any amount of funds back of it, and it can hoe and plow and harrow as many times as it sees fit, but the average farmer, at the rate he has to pay for labor up in the Northwest, can not get the labor to do the work. If he could obtain labor at wages that he could afford to pay, dependent upon the price he would get for his products, he would ask nothing at your hands. You can subserve his interest in a hundred different ways that will be valuable to him. You are doing nothing practical for his benefit in these half a hundred little appropriations, such as one to send out some one to teach children how to plant onions.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I wish to congratulate not only the Senator, but his State and the farmers of his State, upon the high degree of agricultural education which prevails there. I might say there are a good many farmers in the South who make no pretentions to the same degree of education or efficiency as the average North Dakota farmer. I refer to the colored race in the South.

But I may say to the Senator that he is mistaken, even as to his own State. The Agricultural Department expends a little over $5,000 a year in the State of North Dakota toward demonstration work, and the farmers of his State contribute $60,000 a year to cooperate with the farm demonstrators representing the Government of the United States. Each county in the State contributes $3,800 a year in the promotion of this work.

I say to the Senator that while this expenditure on the part of the North Dakota farmer may be unnecessary it is not unnecessary in many portions of the South. In many parts of the South, including Texas, Mississippi, and Louisiana, it has practically revolutionized agriculture. The suggestion was made last season that the demonstration work be discontinued in Oklahoma, and it raised a very storm of protest. No service rendered by the General Government in States, counties, and communities is more highly appreciated or is more serviceable than this farm-demonstration work. I should regard it as a calamity to see it discontinued.

I may add as a mark of credit to the State of North Dakota that its contribution exceeds that of any other State in the Union to this service.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I share the feeling expressed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] when he congratulates the Senator from North Dakota upon the excellent condition of the farmers of his State. Fortunate, indeed, is that country whose farmers are prosperous.

I do not think that any public measure has met with such universal approval among the farmers of my State as the law which puts these agencies at work for the betterment of the condition of the agriculturists of the entire country.

When the proposition was made to limit the work to be done to the appropriation carried in this section of the bill a perfect cyclone of protests came to me from the State of Mississippi. As I said upon the floor of this Chamber several days ago, not 20 per cent of the money expended in this demonstration work was paid by the General Government. Not only the farmers contributed to it, but the merchant, the lawyer, the doctor, the manufacturer, every class and condition of our citizenship contributed to it for the very good reason that upon the products of the farm all enduring prosperity rests. Their contributions to this great work was but the expression of that spirit of altruistic selfishness which underlies all intelligent cooperation. Everything we eat and wear originates with the soil. Propitious seasons and intelligent cultivation bring abundant yield. When the farmer prospers the looms run full time, the rolling stock of the railroads is kept moving, the factories find a market for their fabrics, the mechanic gets his wages for six days in the week, the children of the toiler enjoy the advantages of the school, the credit man collects his accounts, the lawyer's clients are able to pay his fees, the doctor gets his toll, and the preacher is properly clothed and fed, receiving his earthly reward for labors done in the vineyard of the Lord, the smile of joy is upon the happy face of the patient housewife, the merry laughter of children fills the home with light, hope springs eternal in the human breast, and plenty is scattered over a smiling land. But let the farmer fail, let misfortune attend his efforts, let the fates withhold from him propitious seasons, let the blight fall upon his crop, and the chilling winds of adversity will sweep over the land like the withering simoon of the desert. Hope, the propelling force of success in all the walks of life, will leave the heart, the rose of health will fade from the cheek, pallor, the shadow of want, will becloud the countenance, sorrow dim the eye, and despair will freeze the genial current of the soul. In other words, all that is sweet in life, all that works for the uplift of humanity, all that promises good from which hope for the future welfare of the race springs will pass away and the entire superstructure of commerce will crumble and fall.

No, Mr. President, this money is not imprudently or injudiciously invested. The United States Government and the governments of the States have not in the past devoted as much money as they should have done to the development and to the improvement of agriculture. The farmer is now being taught the constituent elements of the soil. He is taught by the demonstrator the proper fertilizer that is necessary to produce the largest and best crops. He is taught as to how his crop should be cultivated, and he is also taught how best it should be harvested. A great work is being done, monumental achievements wrought. Progress is being promoted. The whole country is benefited.

I do not believe a dollar could be appropriated by Congress, I do not believe the United States Government could make an investment that would bring as large a return to all the people as a dollar judiciously invested in the improvement of the system of agriculture in this country.

It is not a question of section; it is not class legislation. All the States and all the people without regard to vocation are interested. The people in the State of my friend the Senator from North Dakota are more fortunate, I judge from his statement, than in some other States of the Union. They have made greater progress; they may not need this assistance; but I dare say if he will go to the farmers who have conferred with these men skilled and learned in the art of intensive farming, men who are familiar with the growth of plants, men who are familiar with the character of the soil, men who understand all the economies of the farm, he will find that this money is not being squandered nor is it a sop thrown to the farmer. The farmers are about the only class of people, Mr. President, in the United States who have not some special agent here looking after their interest.

I wish we could double the appropriation for this work. I wish we could multiply the men who are doing this particular service to humanity.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I appreciate many of the things that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] has just said, and especially do I appreciate the misfortune of an unpropitious season as affecting the prosperity of the farmer. But there is a worse thing than an unpropitious season, and that is an unpropitious administration. That can do him more harm in a single year than the eccentricities of the season may do in 10 or 15 years.

We are suffering to-day not so much because of a lack of ability to produce enough farm products, but we are suffering because we can not get prices for what we do produce sufficient to pay the cost of labor that is producing it. When Senators will understand that condition and look at farm conditions as they are, we will get rid of a great many of these fancy thrills, and we will be able to introduce and pass legislation that will be for the real benefit of the American farmer.

Now, I have not objected in the slightest degree to these demonstration farmers both by the Agriculture Department and by the several agricultural colleges in the States. They are doing a great deal of good in experimenting, because the farmer can not individually spend money in making experimentations like the Government can. But I want to tell the Senator from Mississippi, and I say it with all sincerity and candor, there is not a single one of your farm demonstrators or experts who could go out to-day and buy a farm and apply his processes and make a living. He would have to have the Government back of him to pay the expenses and the deficiency at the end of the year.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will just yield for a moment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly, Mr. President.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will say to the Senator that I have personal acquaintance with a number of young men who went to the Agricultural and Mechanical College of the State of Mississippi, who worked their way through the college, who learned the lessons taught there and have gone upon farms which they themselves bought, and by applying the lessons that they learned in that college have succeeded and are now prosperous farmers. I know those men. The influence of their lives has acted as a very great benefaction to everybody living in the community in which their excellent work has been done; and I can say to the Senator, speaking from personal knowledge, that greater progress has been made in my State in that regard in the last 10 or 15 years than was made for a half century prior thereto; and the good work has scarcely begun. Really that which has been accomplished is but an earnest of the much greater things that shall be done in the near future.

There is no question before the American people to-day in which the farmers are more interested, about which they are more enthusiastic, than they are in this question of improved agriculture; and when the Senator from North Dakota throws anything in the way or puts any sort of a damper on the ardor and the enthusiasm of those people, he is not only injuring the individual man, but he is injuring the citizens of the entire Republic, because, as I said a moment ago, the whole superstructure of commerce rests upon the production of the farm.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I was brought up on a farm; I have farmed all my life; I think I know something about farming; and I want to tell the Senator from Mississippi that if he wants to make the farmer enthusiastic the way to do so is to give him a good price for the things he produces.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am entirely in favor of that.

Mr. McCUMBER. There is the fundamental of all the enthusiasm we shall get on the farm.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am entirely in accord with the Senator from North Dakota on that proposition. I am in favor of any plan, scheme, or measure that will improve agriculture and promote the legitimate interests of the farmer, because I realize that when I help the farmer I contribute to the prosperity of the world.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am glad to know that, Mr. President.

Mr. STONE. Let us have a vote.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; we will have it. The only way, however, that you can give the farmer the price is to do just the same as you do as to other lines of business in the United States—give him the market which belongs to him, a market that he has builded up by his labor, by his toil, by his sacrifices, and by his willingness to pay considerably better prices for the things that he buys, in order that he may make your cities populous, in order that he may give work to your laborers, in order that he may make all of the manufacturing cities of the United States smile with the element of prosperity. The farmer feels that beyond that he is entitled to some consideration on his own part, and that consideration is not being given to him. You protect everything else. In order that you might get a foreign market for the meat product of the packers some years ago you provided for the expenditure of $3,000,000 a year out of the Treasury of the United States to inspect their meats, so that Germany would be satisfied to buy them upon a national inspection. You did that for merely a few hundred packers.

When something similar is requested for the benefit of the producer in the Northwest, to protect him against fraud and imposition, so that he may be allowed even to pay for his own inspection, but that it may be done under Federal auspices and upon a Federal standard, we are unable to get any consideration whatever from you. That would be a benefit. We could estimate our losses with a great degree of accuracy—and they amount to millions of dollars in a single State—but we could get no consideration for that which would be of real benefit to the farmer.

I know there are good boys who go to the agricultural colleges. They come back to the farm and they do accomplish something. There is no question but that the education they get there does them some good. As I was saying, the demonstrations by agricultural colleges and the demonstrations by the Agricultural Department itself have been very beneficial. After all, however, those boys, of whom the Senator from Mississippi speaks, who are making a success of farming—if the Senator will follow them down in their everyday life, he will find that the basis of their success is in their industry and in their economy. Practicing that policy down to bedrock they are able to make a reasonable success in some instances. That is the way the farmers are living to-day.

Those of us who are operating farms, as I myself am doing, pay our losses out of our income from some other source, although every one of us is following the latest fads in the matter of agriculture. I do not know of any one of these agriculturists who is making expenses out of his farm.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. To follow the Senator's argument to its logical conclusion, he is of the opinion that it is an unwarranted prodigality of cash, then, to maintain these agricultural colleges.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no, Mr. President; I have not said to the Senator anything that would indicate that.

Mr. VARDAMAN. But that is the inference that one would naturally draw from what the Senator did say.

I want the Senator from North Dakota to understand that I would not, for any consideration, throw anything in the way of teaching people how to sell their products or to devise suitable means to enable them to get what their products were worth. There may be a difference of opinion, however, amongst Senators and farmers and other men as to the best remedy for the trouble. We all admit the existence of the disease, but there may be a difference of opinion as to the remedy for the evil. I do not, however, want the Senator to understand that I would throw anything in the way of the consummation of the splendid Utopian scheme he has in mind. I have never said anything against it. I wish him Godspeed in his efforts to secure for the farmer every dollar that he is entitled to from the product of his honest toil.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I am seeking the accomplishment of no Utopian project at all. I know enough about farming conditions in this country to know that farmers may never expect anything of that kind. I am simply hoping, and have been laboring here at all times, to benefit that class whose earning capacity is less than that of any other class of American citizens; who live more carefully, who live more economically, and who have to live that way in order to eke out an existence at all, and I have been laboring to secure for them such legislation as would enhance the value of their products.

It is the enhancement of the value of the product rather than in instruction how to raise more of the products for which the farmer can scarcely get prices enough now to pay the expenses of raising them to which I am trying to direct the attention of the Senate, and to point out how there may be provided by legislation some real benefit to the American farmer.

Mr. President, some little good may come from this work; I have no doubt that some little good will accrue to the farming class; but when there is such great good that can be given to the American farmer it seems almost sacrilegious to throw out this crumb to him when we could throw out loaves.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the motion to reconsider offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] will be considered as adopted, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 20, line 25, it is proposed to strike out "$628,240" and insert "$678,240."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota utters a wail over the fact that the farmers do not get reasonable prices, and states that what the farmer needs is good prices. One would draw the conclusion from his remarks that the farmer's products are being sold at beggarly prices. I am not going to reply to those remarks any further than to read the market quotations of to-day:

Chicago—Hogs, receipts, 10,000; steady. Bulk of sales, $8.50 to $8.60; light, $8.35 to $8.60. Cattle, receipts, 25,000; steady. Beeves, $7.50 to $9.30; steers, $7.10 to $8.20; stockers and feeders, $6.40 to $8.55.

Cincinnati—Hogs, receipts, 1,500; market steady; common to choice, $6 to $8. Cattle, receipts, 200; market steady; heifers, $5.75 to $8.50; calves active, $6.50 to $11. Sheep, receipts, 1,400; market steady; lambs steady.

The prices are not given for sheep. Just one other illustration.

Kansas City, Mo.—Hogs, receipts, 15,000; steady. Bulk, $8.30 to $8.50; heavy, $8.45 to $8.50; packers and butchers, $8.35 to $8.50. Cattle, receipts, 7,000, including 100 southerns; steady. Prime fed steers, $8.50 to $9.05; dressed beef steers, $7.50 to $8.40; western steers, $7.25 to $8.65—

The figures given are the prices per hundred, of course. The quotations for cotton are as follows:

Middling upland, 13⅛ cents.
Middling gulf, 13⅜ cents.

On May 18 last year middling upland was 12 cents and middling gulf was 12¼ cents.

Wheat prices—

I read from the New York Herald of to-day—

Wheat prices at new high record—

I am reading the headline—

Many reports received of damage in winter belt by Hessian fly—Trading active.

July wheat opened at 96⅞, ran to 97⅛, and its low price was 96⅝.

May closed at $1.04½.

In the local cash market No. 2 hard winter wheat was quoted at $1.06 c. i. f. New York; No. 2 red, $1.07¼; * * * No. 1 northern, Duluth, $1.05¼; * * * No. 1 northern, Manitoba, $1.05.

Mr. President, in view of those prices and in view of the fact that they are greatly in advance of the prices of a few years ago, the wail from Jericho is a little out of place.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator has presented to us one side of the ledger, but he does not show us the balance. I want to see what it costs to raise the steer. The Senator speaks of a steer the price of which will range from $7 to $7.50. We will suppose that it is a thousand-pound steer, 4 years old. Its value, then, would be $75. Very well. What did it cost to raise that steer? First, the farmer had to buy his land, and, as is shown by the statistics, he gave a mortgage on three-fourths of his natural life before that farm became his. That is the first proposition. Then he had to plow the land; he had to seed it; he had to raise his corn or grain and his hay; he had to build a barn; he and his children had to wait on that steer for four years; they had to water it; they had to feed it; they had to care for it and shelter it; and after those four years of labor at the highest price he could get, his family realized $75 from that steer.

We have a report from the Agricultural Department which shows that last year the average earning capacity of the farmer, his wife, and adult children throughout the United States amounted to 20 cents a day. That is what the farmer got for his labor; and that is what that steer netted that farmer—an average return for 16 hours of labor of 20 cents a day. That is what his prosperity means.

I could take all the other things of which the Senator speaks in the same way. It is true that those are better prices than we have had in some years; but does the Senator know that it now costs four times as much to buy a farm as it did 20 years ago, and that the labor costs from two to two and a half times as much as it did 20 years ago?

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. REED. The Senator's statement is a complete demolition of his argument. When he says that American farms are worth four times as much as they were a few years ago, it is absolute proof that the farmer does not work for 20 cents a day; for if that were all the profit he obtained, his land would not be worth four times as much as it was a few years ago, but would be worth one-fourth as much as it was a few years ago.

The Senator may make these startling statements here in the Senate, but the farmers of the United States know that they make more than 20 cents a day, and a great deal more than 20 cents a day, and that they are in a reasonably prosperous condition.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes, Mr. President; I have had some occasion to look over the mortgages on their farms, and I know something about their prosperity. Of course, I never would attempt to convince the Senator from Missouri of anything. I simply take my statement from the report of the Secretary of Agriculture. He is supposed to have been a reasonably good Secretary and to make a fair estimate. The estimate which I gave was that made by the Secretary of Agriculture, and he shows exactly how he arrived at it. Now, he may be in error. I do not think he is in error, however.

The farmer, of course, can live pretty cheaply on his farm. He has no rent to pay, and he and his children do not get an opportunity to spend their money in theaters or anywhere else. They save, possibly, everything they make. There is no waste, and they get along; but those are the figures that were given me by the Department of Agriculture, published about a year ago.

Mr. REED. I challenge the Senator from North Dakota to produce any report of the Agricultural Department which states that the farmers of the United States, on the average, make only 20 cents a day.

Mr. McCUMBER. I gave it in an address some time ago. I am not going back to look over the address and give it to the Senator again, challenge or no challenge.

Mr. REED. There is no such report.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator knows anything about the price of land in the United States, owing to its scarcity since the public lands have all been taken up, he knows that he can go out into Montana or Idaho or any of these States and find land that you could have bought 20 years ago for a dollar and a half an acre that you can not buy now for $20 an acre, and similar changes have taken place to a great extent all over the country. It is not that the land is more valuable, not that it will produce more, but people have to live somewhere, and there are a great many people who were brought up as farmers who still would cling to the farm even though they could make five times as much in the city.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Did I understand the Senator from North Dakota to say that the farmer had to wait on the steer 16 hours out of the 24? Did he say that? If so, I am a little interested to know just what breed of steer it is that demands that amount of waiting on. The steers in my part of the world are quite self-helpful, and generally wait upon themselves for the greater part of the year.

I ask the question seriously. I should like to know what class or breed of steer it is that you raise in North Dakota? They must be tenderfeet, indeed.

Mr. McCUMBER. They are not Jersey steers, of course.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That is their misfortune. They are not only not Jersey steers, but they have not Jerseymen's help. If they had, they would have been more prosperous.

Our farmers do not get rich; but, including the fact that they have their homes and the comfortable and almost luxurious living which the average farmer has, I think it amounts to more than 20 cents a day. I think the Senator could not have intended to convey the idea that it meant only 20 cents a day. He did not calculate the thousand and one comforts that come to a farmer. There are many comforts that come to a farmer beyond the matter of mere money.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, Mr. President, I think the Senator will not follow that line of argument to any great extent. I take my statements, as I said, from the Agricultural Department reports. I know something about farming conditions in my country. If the Senator raises down in his State steers that take care of themselves the year around, take themselves to slaughter and convert themselves into meat without any labor on the part of the farmer, he can get whatever he can out of that kind of an argument.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Oh, I never made any suggestion or proposition of that kind. I did feel, however, that the Senator's statement was a little extravagant; and in the interests of better agriculture I thought I should like to know the breed and class of steer to which the Senator referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. JAMES. There is a proviso there in regard to the use of the money. It provides that no part of the fund appropriated shall be used in connection with any appropriations from the Rockefeller fund. That amount ought to be corrected so as to read "$678,240" instead of "$623,240."

Mr. GORE. I ask that the correction be made to conform to the amount appropriated.

Mr. JAMES. Just so as to make it conform to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the proviso will be amended so as to conform to the amendment that has been adopted.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I am directed by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to propose the amendment which I send to the desk. I present the amendment on behalf of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 70, line 14, it is proposed to strike out "$50,000" and insert "$100,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. KENYON. Let us know what it is, Mr. President.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will make the explanation. It is the item in regard to experiments and demonstrations in live-stock production in the cane-sugar and cotton districts of the United States.

Mr. KENYON. Was not that voted out?

Mr. RANSDELL. The House gave $50,000 for that work, and the Senate added $50,000 more, making a total of $100,000. A point of order was made against the item because it contained what was considered new legislation. It is on page 70 of the bill, if the Senator would like to find it. It went out on a point of order.

Mr. KENYON. How does it get in now?

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator from Oklahoma, by instruction of the committee, changes the item, strikes out the proviso that was obnoxious to the rule, and simply asks to increase the amount to $100,000. It is clearly needed. The objectionable part is stricken out.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I did not hear what the Senator had to say in relation to the amendment. I will ask that the amendment be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 70, line 14, it is proposed to strike out "$50,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$100,000."

Mr. RANSDELL. I will say to the Senator that the clauses to which he objected the other day are not included. They are stricken out. The amount is simply raised, so that it will not be subject to a point of order.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, that is subject to the same point of order that the other part of the amendment was, on the ground that it increases an item in an appropriation bill without an estimate being made for it by the department.

Mr. RANSDELL. I hope the Senator will not raise the point of order. The House put in an appropriation for $50,000 in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture. The Senate raised that to $100,000. In testifying before the Senate committee the Secretary of Agriculture said that this additional amount was necessary, and the increase is made in accordance with the recommendation of the Senate Committee on Agriculture. It seems to me it comes clearly within the rule, and I hope it will be agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if this is a committee amendment.

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator offers it as a committee amendment?

Mr. RANSDELL. It is submitted as a committee amendment by the chairman of the committee, by instruction of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not understand that this item has been estimated for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that is not necessary where it is a committee amendment.

Mr. RANSDELL. I did not understand what the Senator said.

Mr. SMOOT. I said I did not understand that it had been estimated for by the Treasury Department.

Mr. RANSDELL. I can not say that it was officially estimated for in advance. It was estimated for while the bill was being prepared. I do not consider that it is necessary when it is introduced as a committee amendment. It was moved by a standing committee of the Senate, and it was estimated for by the head of the department. It is in strict accordance with the rule.

Mr. McCUMBER. What has been done with the amendment of the committee following line 16?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It went out on a point of order.

Mr. RANSDELL. It went out on a point of order, and I am willing to leave it out.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator explain to me why we have still got to have another $100,000 to be expended, not generally, but in just one State?

Mr. RANSDELL. If the Senator would like to have me repeat the speech I made several days ago, I shall be very glad to tell him that it is because of the situation the people are in now in the sugar section of Louisiana. They find it impossible to make sugar profitably. They find it necessary to engage in some other kind of agriculture. They have been making sugar there for over a hundred years. They are not familiar with stock raising, the raising of hogs, cattle, and things of that kind. It was thought by friends of the State and by the Agricultural Department that if a live-stock farm were established down there those people might be taught by practical demonstration to engage in the successful raising of live stock, particularly cattle and hogs. That is the purpose of it.

I may say that the people there have suffered very heavy losses. A gentleman was here three days ago, Mr. Matthews, who told me that three years ago he was offered $1,000,000 for his plantation, and now he could not sell it for $200,000.

The losses that have occurred to the people down there are almost incalculable. They are really in a desperate situation. The purpose of this amendment is to try to help them to help themselves, to do something with those lands.

I shall be glad to answer any further questions that may be asked.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to suggest that a great many years, on account of hot winds in the Northwest, whole States, nearly, areas equivalent to the entire State of Louisiana, will lose their entire crop, so that they get no benefit whatever from it. Would the Senator in those cases provide an appropriation of $100,000 for each one of those States to teach them how to develop live stock?

Mr. RANSDELL. I should be delighted to appropriate whatever the Agricultural Department says is needed for the development of live stock or any other industry in States which are stricken as hard as the case stated by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Would there not be a much easier and a better method of taking care of the cane industry down there in some other way, so that the cane industry may be profitable?

Mr. RANSDELL. If the Senator can suggest any practical method, I shall be very glad to have him do so. He will thereby confer a wonderful boon on those people.

Mr. McCUMBER. All right: I will suggest one. I suggest a tariff of a dollar and a half a hundred on sugar.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will ask the Senator if that is a practical suggestion at this time?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know. That depends on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It looks more favorable all the time.

Mr. RANSDELL. If the Senator wishes to offer that as an amendment to this bill, I for one shall not make a point of order against it. I will assure him of that.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am afraid some of the Senator's colleagues would. I want to ask the Senator again, however, because of the language of this particular provision, "for the development of live-stock production in the cane-sugar and cotton districts of the United States," whether it requires a different kind of demonstration to produce live stock in the cane-sugar and in the cotton districts of the United States than in other districts?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not know that it requires any different kind, but we do need it down there very badly. If the Senator needs it very badly up in his State and will demonstrate it to us, he can get my vote for it, and I believe he can get the votes of the majority.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the beet industry will suffer quite a little, as well as the cane industry. Would the Senator have any objection to inserting the word "beet-sugar" there, so as to read "cane-sugar, beet-sugar, and cotton districts of the United States"?

Mr. RANSDELL. I will say to the Senator that there is another provision here appropriating, if I mistake not, about $41,000 for the beet-sugar section of the country. I will say furthermore, that when this measure was before the House and before the Senate no complaints were made in behalf of the beet-sugar section. We were not asked there to give anything to afford them special relief. Complaints were made with regard to the sugar section of Louisiana; evidence was introduced to show the desperate condition of those people and their great need.

I want to say to the Senator that every agricultural need presented to the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was provided for. I will ask the Senator now if he appeared before the Agricultural Committee and made any request for an appropriation to develop the live-stock industry in the beet-sugar sections of the United States, or if anyone else did, so far as he knows?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; but I appeared before the Agricultural Committee, and got the Agricultural Committee to report unanimously a bill for the relief of the industry in my State, and the Senator promptly voted against it, as did the majority of the Senators on that side, so I would have very little encouragement if I were to go before that committee on any other matter. I do not think it would amount to a great deal, because in that instance I had the unanimous report of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and I had almost the unanimous vote of the Senators on that side against the provision reported unanimously by their committee. There does not seem to be much relation between the report of the committee and the action of the Senate on the report, unless, of course, they see fit to follow it.

Mr. RANSDELL. May I ask if that was an item on the agricultural appropriation bill or a separate and distinct measure?

Mr. McCUMBER. That was a separate and distinct bill. I assumed, however, that the principle would be about the same.

Mr. RANSDELL. I think the committee has stood religiously by the appropriations carried in the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator has considerable facility, and, as I notice, all have upon the other side. One reading this would think that the whole bill was intended for the cotton industry in some way. If the Senator will bear with me, he will find that this is for development of live-stock production in the cane-sugar sections—that is, in the Senator's section, where the cane-sugar industry has been destroyed by a late law passed by his colleagues. But it proceeds to state also "and the cotton districts of the United States." Now, what has happened to cotton that it is necessary to teach people how to develop live stock in the cotton section? Has that been destroyed, too? When taking care of the boll weevil, the only enemy to cotton, by an appropriation of about a million dollars, why is it necessary that we should proceed now to appropriate $100,000 for demonstrations in connection with the development of live-stock production in the cotton districts of the United States? Why should we differentiate the cotton districts from the rest of the United States in the matter of information concerning stock raising?

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator has indulged in a good deal of good-natured scolding of the Members of the Senate, especially those on this side of the Chamber, for not staying here and listening to speeches by himself and others on different bills that have been up lately. I say to him if he had been here during the debate on this item several days ago he would not have asked that question. It was very clearly brought out then that the purpose of this amendment is to furnish money to develop by demonstration work the live-stock industry in the sugar sections of the United States. But it is not confined to Louisiana. There is a considerable amount of cane sugar raised in Texas. It was plainly shown at that time——

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator assumed that I was not here, and I wish to correct him.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will ask the Senator if he was satisfied with the explanation. I hope I am not one of those who wish to repeat.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to get down to cotton. I will not say that I am satisfied, but I understand——

Mr. RANSDELL. As was stated several days ago, there is considerable area in the State of Louisiana which was formerly in cotton. When the boll weevil came and drove cotton from the lower portion of the belt into the northern portion of the State, and also did very great damage not only there but in other States, the sugar industry moved northward and a considerable area was planted in cane within the last seven or eight years that formerly had been planted in cotton. The weevil drove out the cotton and the tariff has driven out the cane, and those people are between the devil and the deep blue sea. They have got to do something. They are asking the National Government to help them to go into the live-stock business. It is that portion of the cotton belt of the South, and only that portion, I may say, where this demonstration farm work is to be carried on.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator says they are between the devil and the deep blue sea. I suppose the Senator means that they are between the weevil and the tariff.

Mr. RANSDELL. Well, that is a very good way of putting it, and I accept the amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yet, Mr. President, I confess I can not understand why it is necessary to get an expert and to spend $100,000 to inform people how to develop live stock. Live stock is a matter of breeding. Any farmer who has a Jersey cow knows how to raise a Jersey, and he knows how to raise Chester pigs, and he knows how to raise different breeds of horses. For the life of me, I can not see why it is necessary to throw $100,000 into that State for the purpose of teaching farmers how to develop a stock industry, which development, of course, means raising stock. I assume the farmer knows how to feed them; I assume he knows how to breed them. If he wants them, I can not see why he can not own them and produce them the same as is done in other sections of the United States, and doubly, if there is anything at all in it, I can not see why we should make a Mason and Dixon's line out of this matter. In three-fourths of these appropriations we are trying to crowd everything into the cotton-raising belt. Why could not the Senators send down copies of the book on diseases of the horse, and the publication on the different breeds of horses, and so forth, gotten up by the Agricultural Department, and say to the farmers, "Go to this; here is your information"?

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I believe a good many hogs are raised out in the Senator's State. I hope so. We had recently before the Senate a bill appropriating half a million dollars for the eradication and prevention and cure of hog cholera. I did everything I could for the immediate passage of that law. I think it a wise law. I believe I reported the bill. It was not for my part of the country. Unfortunately, we have very few hogs down there. We are trying to persuade the people of Louisiana to go into the hog business. We are trying to persuade them to go into the cattle business. We are trying to persuade them to adopt the wise system of diversified farming indulged in in the State of the Senator from North Dakota, and indulged in by the farmers in most of the Northern and Western States. You have not followed a system of one crop alone, as they have done in Louisiana, unfortunately, to their great sorrow at this time.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator——

Mr. RANSDELL. Let me answer the question, if you please.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. We are trying now to get this instruction to people who know nothing but sugar, who do not understand how to breed cattle and to feed cattle and to breed hogs and to raise hogs, because they have never done it. You can not teach a man a new business in a few weeks or a few months. Where they have been in the habit of raising cattle and hogs and sheep and horses and mules it can be done successfully; but in that section of the South where there are large plantations occupied in many instances by several hundred and in some places by thousands of laborers and employees, where they do not raise cattle at all, where their entire attention has for a century or more been given to raising cane to be converted into sugar, you can understand, it seems to me, that to go into this industry is something new, something entirely strange to them, something that they must be taught to do and encouraged to do and shown to do. This demonstration farm can bring in some varieties of cattle and different varieties of hogs and show those people how to raise corn and oats and hay and all the proper varieties to feed hogs and cattle. It can help them and encourage them; and that is the idea of it.

I will say to the Senator that I am sorry they do not know how to do it as well as his people, but they are not as intelligent as the people of his State. I admit that they are ignorant on this subject and need help. I hope the Senator will be generous enough to vote for this provision without any further discussion of it. I assure him that I will support any measure that he can produce looking to the relief of his section if his section needs it and he can show that it is needed.

Mr. McCUMBER. I got fooled on that once, and I do not think I will take another chance.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will say to the Senator in response to his taunt that they were not at all agreed in his own section of country on his bill. If the people of the North and the Northwest, the grain sections, had been at all agreed, we would have voted for your measure; but many of the very best men of the grain section disagreed with the Senator, and that is why his bill did not pass.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; the Senator found one man. I am waiting for the Senator to complete his remarks.

Mr. RANSDELL. I have completed my remarks, unless the Senator wants to ask me a question.

Mr. McCUMBER. I may be in error, but I am certainly sincere in the belief that although the farmers in the Senator's State have been in the habit of raising cane, nevertheless they will know how to raise a mule, and we do not need to appropriate $100,000 to tell them how to develop a mule or how to feed a mule or how to take care of a mule.

The Senator spoke of the appropriations that were made for the hog cholera. You did not divide up that appropriation by States and say this appropriation is to be used, for example, in the States of Ohio and Indiana. It is general legislation covering the entire country. But here you say this appropriation is to be used in the cotton belt, although you have provided half a hundred other items where the money is to be used in the cotton belt.

Although we do not raise many hogs in our State, I did not object to the provision that was thought necessary to check the hog cholera; but what I do object to is that part of the Union getting the hog end of everything in this bill, as is clearly evident in every line and every sentence of it. Appropriations are made that to me seem to be absolutely ridiculous, based upon the assumption that the farmers do not know how to feed stock or to raise stock or to do anything. I admit that the farmers in the Senator's State are just as intelligent as they are in mine; I made no invidious distinction; but I would think it was hunting for an excuse to appropriate the money of the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Louisiana that he yield to me for the purpose of moving an executive session.

Mr. RANSDELL. I would yield to the Senator, but in just one moment we can vote. I think the debate is now through.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is now 10 minutes after 5 o'clock.

Mr. RANSDELL. I hope the Senator will not press that motion. The matter has been here two or three times, and we can vote on it now, I believe, without any more discussion. I ask the Senator to defer the motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We can not vote on it without further discussion.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not believe there will be further discussion. Let us see, at any rate, whether we can vote on it or not.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that I hope to finish the bill in a few minutes. There is only one other amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator could not possibly finish the bill in a few minutes.

Mr. GORE. I ask the Senator to let us try it out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will wait five minutes, Mr. President, before I make the motion.

Mr. RANSDELL. I ask that a vote be taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator that before the bill goes into the Senate I shall reserve the right to offer at least three amendments in the Senate.

I ask attention in relation to the point of order to Rule XVI, paragraph 2:

All amendments to general appropriation bills moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, proposing to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add new items of appropriation, shall, at least one day before they are considered, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations—

And so forth.

Of course, this was not referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It was offered as an amendment upon the floor of the Senate. It was not offered by the Senator as an amendment. It was never printed. It was never referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It never has been reported from that committee. I, of course, think that a point of order should lie against the amendment. But I want to say to the Senator from Louisiana that that same question was overruled, notwithstanding that was the position taken by the Chair the other day, and I am not going to invoke that rule against his amendment at this time

Of course, Mr. President, I am still of the same opinion that I was when I spoke on this subject the other day. I do not believe this appropriation is going to do the good people of Louisiana any good whatever, with the single exception that there will be that much Government money to spend within the borders of the State; and to me, Mr. President, that is a very poor sop to offer to that great State for the destruction of its principal industry.

I said to the Senator the other day that I was not going to make an objection to it, but seeing all the other items that have gone in, every sort of an appropriation, for everything that could be imagined, I must say that I have been in the Senate some 11 years and I have watched appropriation bills pretty closely, and there never has been an appropriation bill reported to the Senate in that time filled with so many items that never should appear in an appropriation bill.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I wish to make a motion about the hour of meeting to-morrow, if the Senator will yield to me for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KERN. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANSDELL. If there is to be no further debate, I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield the floor?

Mr. RANSDELL. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I have finished what I have to say now.

Mr. RANSDELL. If there is to be no further debate, I ask for a vote.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the amendment adds new items of appropriation, and that it was not, at least one day before it was considered, referred to the Committee on Appropriations as an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has held that the expression "Committee on Appropriations" refers in this case to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, which is the Committee on Appropriations for the pending bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Chair may have the information, and I may be in error; but I ask the Chair whether this was an amendment which was submitted and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry?

Mr. RANSDELL. It was introduced and submitted to the Committee on Agriculture for the appropriation of $100,000, as set forth in the proviso. The particular amendment just introduced was prepared to-day and introduced here by instructions of the committee, but the amendment appropriating $100,000 was prepared and introduced in the Senate and submitted to the Committee on Agriculture when the bill was before that committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator is mistaken. I do not believe the Senator introduced that amendment in the Senate and had it referred to the Committee on Agriculture in one day.

Mr. RANSDELL. I said emphatically to the Senator that I did not introduce it to-day; that the amendment was introduced some time ago, when the bill was before the Committee on Agriculture, and it was the specific item of $100,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I say, Mr. President, that the amendment before the Senate to-day to increase the appropriation of $50,000 to $100,000 has not been offered to the Senate nor has it been referred by the Senate to any committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the case as it stands at this time. The present occupant of the chair ruled on the point of order made by the Senator from Utah that the amendment presented by the Committee on Agriculture was out of order. The committee has since that time reframed the amendment, retaining the same appropriation, and, in the opinion of the Chair, that complies with the spirit of the rule which requires an amendment to be printed and referred to the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not so understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment is substantially the same as the amendment heretofore printed, except that the portions which rendered it obnoxious to the point of order have been omitted.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, I misunderstand what the amendment is. I understood the Senator's amendment to be to simply strike out "$50,000" and to insert "$100,000." Am I correct?

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator certainly is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct, in substance.

Mr. RANSDELL. And it was for the purpose set forth in the original House bill. The others were simply clauses enlarging it.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, if I am correct, there is not any question that paragraph 2 of Rule XVI applies to this amendment. This is not the same amendment that was offered heretofore. I wish also to say that the original amendment was never presented to this body and referred to the committee. It was reported from the committee, as stated by the Senator here the other day, but it was never referred to the committee by the Senate.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator is mistaken. The amendment was referred to the Agricultural Committee.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, it is nearly half past 5 o'clock, and I think it is impossible to finish the consideration of the bill to-night. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 20 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 36 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 21, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 20, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty and most merciful Father, in whose sacred presence we dwell and under whose providence we have been brought through prosperity and adversity, sunshine, and storms to the present hour, and hast placed us foremost among the great nations of the earth. Thou hast taught us by Thy revealed word and through the experiences of the past "that righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people." Help us therefore, we beseech Thee, to do justly, to love mercy, and walk humbly with Thee our God; that the genius of our Republic may more and more obtain that we may become a beacon light leading on to peace and righteousness in all the earth. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE CONGRESSIONAL CLUB.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have a note read at the Clerk's desk, with an explanation that is of interest to the Members of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to have a note read at the Clerk's desk. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The note which I send to the desk, Mr. Speaker, was sent to me by the secretary of the Congressional Club, the club to which our wives belong, extending an invitation, and I ask that the Clerk read the note.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Congressional Club requests the honor of the presence of the Members of the House of Representatives at the ceremonies incident to the laying of the corner stone of the new clubhouse on Thursday morning, May 21, at half past 10 o'clock, New Hampshire Avenue and U Street NW.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the House for its information in connection with the note that he had agreed to make a speech [applause] at 10.30, and so notified the club in answer to a letter yesterday morning. But after that the House passed an order changing the time of meeting to 11 o'clock. It was impossible for the Chair to be here and there too, and so the Chair notified them they would have to get some one else. Then they changed the time of meeting to 12 o'clock. So if Members go they will go at 12 o'clock instead of half past 10.

EXPLANATION OF A VOTE.

Mr. GUERNSEY. Mr. Speaker, for some time I have maintained a pair with the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. GUDGER, and on yesterday, on the second roll call, I asked the pair clerks if they would transfer him and protect him, in order that I might vote. The pair clerks said they would make the transfer, so I voted. I find that he was not transferred, was not protected, and it seems to me that the RECORD should be corrected and I allowed to withdraw my vote and be recorded "present," as I want to keep faith with the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made so as to show that the gentleman from Maine voted "present." Without objection, the correction will be made in the RECORD and the Journal.

There was no objection.

CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend some remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter which I wrote to the Civil Service Commission, their reply, and a letter I have received from the Postmaster General.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing some correspondence between himself and the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. BORLAND. Reserving the right to object, what does this relate to?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. To the civil service. The letter I received from the Post Office Department says that they appoint the highest man for rural carrier; that is, the one that received the highest grade. The letter I have received from the Civil Service Department shows that the rule has not yet reached Indiana. In that State in every instance a Democrat has been appointed, and in two-thirds of the instances the second or third man on the list has been appointed.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman has not any interest in the matter except a little politics?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; I have an interest in seeing that the Democratic Party carries out its promises.

Mr. BORLAND. If the gentleman thinks it is important enough to cumber the RECORD with, I will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BARKLEY. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky objects.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Calendar Wednesday may be dispensed with to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to dispense with Calendar Wednesday as far as to-day is concerned.

Mr. MANN. I object.

REVISION OF THE LAWS—JUDICIAL TITLE.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the unfinished business is the bill H. R. 15578. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. RUSSELL in the chair.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, on last Wednesday we passed over section 67 for the purpose of considering an amendment as a substitute for that section. I ask unanimous consent that we return to section 67, and as this amendment and the substitute relates to sections 67, 68, and 69, all being considered together, I ask that we go back to those three sections, and when we do so I will move to strike out the three sections and the amendments will be withdrawn, if it is agreeable to the committee, and other sections offered in lieu thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to return to sections 67, 68, and 69. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Now the gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment offered to those sections.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment, and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw mine.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request made by the gentleman from Louisiana? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment offered by him. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair understands that it is the purpose of the gentleman from Louisiana to move to strike out the three sections. Is that correct?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. To strike out and insert.

Mr. WATKINS. It is my purpose to offer each one separately. I shall move to strike out all three of them. My purpose is to move to strike them out and insert other material in the place of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The question, then, will be, first, on the motion to strike out the sections.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, if we strike out—and I do not move to insert—then the sections lose their place in the bill, so I desire to strike out, first, section 67 and insert a new section in lieu thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send his amendment to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 35, line 23, strike out the section and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 67. That all fees and emoluments authorized by law to be paid to clerks of United States district courts shall be charged as heretofore, and shall be collected by said clerks and covered into the Treasury of the United States; that it shall be the duty of all clerks of United States district courts to require payment in advance for services to be rendered by them otherwise than for the United States, except where the person requiring the services is relieved by law from prepayment of fees and costs; and that, subject to this limitation, the clerk shall account quarterly for all fees and emoluments earned within the quarter last preceding such accounting, and for all fees and emoluments received within the quarter which had been earned prior thereto: Provided, That the portion of the fees which the naturalization law allows clerks of the United States district courts to retain shall be accounted for to the United States, and be included in the quarterly accounting for naturalization fees required by law to be made, except that upon the approval of the Secretary of Labor a clerk of any United States court collecting naturalization fees in excess of $6,000 in the fiscal year 1914, or in any fiscal year thereafter, may retain so much of $3,000 of naturalization fees in the following fiscal year as may be necessary to pay for the clerical assistants, for naturalization purposes only, which clerks of courts are required to employ by section 13 of the act of June 29, 1906 (34 Stat. L., pt. 1, p. 596); and said clerks shall be paid for their official services salaries and compensation hereinafter provided, and not otherwise: Provided further, That this section shall not be construed to require or authorize fees to be charged against or collected from the United States, except in case of mileage allowance and per diem compensation when clerks are attending court at places other than their official residence, as provided in section 66 of this act."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, in what particular does this change the present law?

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, it changes the present law in a good many material respects. The principal change is this: Under the present law the clerks of the court receive a salary up to $3,500, provided the fees of the office taken in amount to $3,500, and under the recommendation of the commission which was authorized to codify the laws the item was inserted in this bill which we are now considering at $5,000; but the present amendment, instead of fixing it uniformly all over the United States at $5,000, regulates it in conformity with a bill to which my attention has been called, which was reported favorably from the Committee on the Judiciary, regulating and fixing the fees in conformity with the amount of work which is being done or has been done or will probably be done hereafter in the various districts throughout the United States.

Mr. MADDEN. Fixing the salaries on a graduated scale?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; according to the work that is performed.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the minimum rate of compensation to be paid under this amendment?

Mr. WATKINS. Two thousand five hundred dollars is the lowest amount allowed for any.

Mr. MADDEN. And $6,000 is the highest?

Mr. WATKINS. No; I believe $4,500 is the highest. It is regulated in this way: If the $5,000 remained in the bill, which was recommended by the commission, the fees, when they accumulated to the amount of $5,000, would go indirectly to the clerks; and in making an investigation before the Department of Justice, and in making inquiries of the other departments, the Department of Labor included, it was ascertained that the fees would approximately amount to the figures which are now stated in this amendment in many instances, according to the different reports which we have received from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MADDEN. Does this amendment make an increase or a decrease in the average compensation of the clerk?

Mr. WATKINS. It will make in the average compensation an increase, for this reason, because heretofore, until the act of March 3, 1911, was enacted into law, the clerks of the district courts did their work and the clerks of the circuit courts did their work. The clerks of the circuit courts being abolished, it puts this additional work upon the clerks of the district courts. It virtually does not amount to an increase, while literally the figures show that it is an increase.

Mr. MADDEN. It gives the district clerks more compensation than now?

Mr. TOWNER. I think not.

Mr. WATKINS. It gives them more than they got before the circuit courts were abolished?

Mr. TOWNER. Not more than they get now.

Mr. MADDEN. More than they were receiving while the circuit and district courts were being run separately.

Mr. TOWNER. I will say that I will make a full statement, as this is an amendment that I offered.

Mr. WATKINS. I will state that the gentleman from Iowa having offered the amendment originally last Wednesday, and having taken it carefully under consideration from that time until now, I agree fully with the position he takes with reference to the matter; and we want to have the bill in such shape when it is finished that it will be as near perfect as we can possibly make it, and for that reason I would like to hear an explanation from the gentleman from Iowa, who has made careful study of this question.

Mr. MADDEN. My interest in this matter is to see that all the clerks are treated justly.

Mr. WATKINS. That is what we are trying to do.

Mr. MADDEN. And nothing is taken away from them to which they are entitled?

Mr. WATKINS. There were quite lengthy reports issued from the Judiciary Committee, and hearings had before that committee, and reports made from the various departments of the Government on this fee bill and on this salary proposition of the clerks, and I think, after careful examination, we have got it down just as near correctly as we can, and on as near a basis of uniformity and justice as, perhaps, it can be gotten.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. I would like to suggest to the chairman of the committee that, perhaps, the committee ought to have before it the entire three sections so that they might be considered together.

Mr. WATKINS. I do not object at all to having them read. If there is no objection, let them be read at this time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I notice that this amendment provides in the case of naturalization fees that the clerk may retain one-half of the amount collected on naturalization for clerical assistance up to $3,000.

Mr. WATKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. So that the clerk in no court could receive under this more than $3,000 for additional clerks in naturalization cases?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Well, that practice in New York and Chicago will prevent naturalization being carried out.

Mr. WATKINS. We tried to make it as nearly in conformity with the recommendations from the Department of Labor as we could.

Mr. MANN. I hold in my hand a letter from the clerk of the superior court in Chicago, a Democratic official and, I believe, a very efficient one, and he says he is now turning in $20,000 a year in naturalization fees and is absolutely without the power to take care of all the naturalization cases that come to that court because they have not the clerks with which to do the work.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why is not provision made by the State authorities to provide additional clerks which has been made in the State of Wisconsin and other States?

Mr. MANN. Why should the State provide additional clerks for naturalization cases in order to turn the fees of those cases into the General Government?

Mr. STAFFORD. Because under the general law, which this does not attempt to affect, one-half of the fees may be retained by the local State authorities.

Mr. MANN. That is where the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think I am.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman is mistaken in both particulars. That is not the law, and this does affect it, because this amendment specifically provides that they could only retain one-half the fees up to $3,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is in error.

Mr. MANN. I have just read the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have also just read it. The gentleman makes a different interpretation of it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Louisiana bears out my interpretation.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not believe he does.

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. MANN. He has just said so.

Mr. WATKINS. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit me, I will ask an extension of his time. I would like to get the Clerk to read this letter from the Chief of the Bureau of Naturalization so that we may have the matter fully in mind and in hand.

Mr. MANN. Well, now, would not the gentleman do this: Here is an amendment which is read in the committee, which gentlemen have not had an opportunity to consider, the other amendment being withdrawn. Would not the gentleman let this and these other amendments that are proposed to be offered be offered to these three sections and let them be passed over?

Mr. WATKINS. I think that would be fair if that meets the approval of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit me? I read from the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana, which says:

Provided, That the portion of the fees which the naturalization law allows clerks of the United States courts to retain shall be accounted for to the United States.

There is nothing in the pending amendment that refers to fees retained by clerks of State courts.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is correct, I think.

Mr. STAFFORD. Thank you.

Mr. MANN. But this would apply to the Federal court.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no question about that.

Mr. MANN. Where there is a very similar situation.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no question about that, and I believe the matter should go over so that the Members of the House will have time to give it thorough consideration.

Mr. CALDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. CALDER. The United States district court for the southern district of New York will collect this year in fees for naturalization $20,000, and the eastern district court about $16,000. The practice has been to allow these clerks one-half of all of the fees collected.

Mr. MANN. Up to a certain amount?

Mr. CALDER. No; one-half of all the fees.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is a matter of appropriation, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. CALDER. They have allowed the clerks one-half of the first $6,000, and then allowed them one-half of all the additional fees for the employment of clerks, subject to the approval of the Secretary of Labor. Now, they have not allowed them this additional money unless they use a large proportion of the one-half of the first $6,000 to employ clerical help. If this amendment allows them only $3,000, it simply means the discharge of some very necessary clerks, and that is true in Chicago, New York, Brooklyn, Boston, New Orleans, and other large cities of the country where United States district courts are located.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the chairman of the committee may be allowed to have printed in the RECORD a letter received by him from the department, so that it will be before the Members for consideration. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] if he will not have printed in that connection the letter, or the substance of it, which he has, so that we may have it before the House?

Mr. MANN. Well, I will have it printed. I had turned this over to the Committee on Appropriations, but I could turn over the printed copy to them.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Louisiana and the gentleman from Illinois have printed certain letters that they have received from the department. To what letters does the gentleman refer?

Mr. TOWNER. The letter received from the Department of Labor by the chairman of the committee, and the letter received from——

Mr. MANN. I have several letters here on the subject, all relating to each other.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] asks unanimous consent that this section be passed——

Mr. MANN. And that leave be given to print these letters.

The CHAIRMAN. And leave be granted to print these letters in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. And, further, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. One thing at a time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does that cover the request?

Mr. WATKINS. For the present; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Following are the letters referred to:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, May 18, 1914.

Hon. J. T. WATKINS,
Chairman Committee on Revision of the Laws,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of the 18th instant, addressed to the Commissioner of Naturalization, offering to consider any suggestions the department might have to make in relation to section 67 of the act of codification, pending in the House, and your substitute for said section.

You understand, of course, that the Department of Justice has no authority in relation to the question of the retention of naturalization fees under section 13 of the act of June 29, 1906.

Some years ago, when the House Committee on the Judiciary had under consideration a fee bill for the clerks of courts, a representative from the former Department of Commerce and Labor, the Chief of the Division (as it was then) of Naturalization, appeared before the committee, and after presenting the views of the department in relation to the subject, those views were embodied in the act just as they now appear in the substitute offered by Representative TOWNER to section 67 above referred to and to your substitute therefor, except that the words "Secretary of Commerce" should be "Secretary of Labor."

The bill under consideration by the Judiciary Committee was designed, of course, to place clerks of courts on a salary rather than on a fee basis. That portion of the said bill relating to fees in naturalization proceedings was so arranged as to enable the department to prevent delay to applicants for naturalization in Federal courts because of insufficiency in clerical force, and to make such allowance as might be necessary to prevent such deficiency. You will see the importance to good administration of adopting the terms of the judiciary bill above referred to, since it enables the department to make suitable provision to obviate the delays to those seeking citizenship heretofore experienced in a number of courts by reason of insufficiency of clerical force in said courts.

Very truly, yours,

J. B. DENSMORE,
Acting Secretary.

SUPERIOR COURT OF COOK COUNTY,
Chicago, May 12, 1914.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I am herewith inclosing you copy of a letter addressed to the Department of Labor, Bureau of Naturalization, in which the clerk of this court requests an appropriation of $8,100 in addition to the $3,000 allowed by law for his naturalization department; also copy of a letter from the bureau in reply thereto.

The material increase in naturalization business of this office has been largely due to the courteous treatment extended to the public by Mr. Morris Marx, who has been in charge of this department for the past seven years.

I would appreciate it if you would use your best endeavors in securing the same.

Yours, very truly,

CHARLES M. FOELL.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
BUREAU OF NATURALIZATION,
Washington, May 8, 1914.

CLERK OF THE SUPERIOR COURT,
Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of the 6th instant, in which you set forth the needs of your office for the next fiscal year in the way of assistants in naturalization matters.

At the present time it is not possible to indicate whether there can be any additional allowance made to you, inasmuch as the appropriation requested by the department of Congress has not been made, and, furthermore, the Appropriations Committee has not reported out the bill to Congress in which this item is usually carried.

Your request, however, will be considered at such time as it is possible to make allowances, and everything will be done that is possible to afford you sufficient relief in the matter.

Very truly, yours,

RICHARD K. CAMPBELL,
Commissioner of Naturalization.

MAY 6, 1914.

BUREAU OF NATURALIZATION,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: To satisfactorily carry out the duties imposed upon my naturalization department for the coming fiscal year commencing July 1, 1914, it will be necessary that your honorable branch of the Government allot me the help herein requested:

I am taking the liberty of applying for my needs early enough so that my allotment may be given due consideration. The volume of naturalization business ending the fiscal year June 30, 1914, will amount to between twenty five to twenty-seven thousand dollars. You can readily see that the revenue in excess of the amount allowed by law—$3,000—and the extra clerks allotted me—$2,650, total $5,650—I am turning into the United States Treasury approximately $20,000.

The coming year will impose heavier duties upon this department on account of the coming elections—congressional, State, city, and county, etc. I have already been informed by the Polish societies of this city that they expect to file about 5,000 petitions before the next spring elections. Another fraternal organization, such as the Young Men's Christian Association, the Building Trades' Council, the Brewery Workers' Union have informed me that they will keep me busy for the coming elections.

You can readily see that I am going to be kept busy. Cook County during the last three years has issued about 40,000 declarations of intention, of which 25,000 will be ready by next September for final petitions.

My chief naturalization clerk, Mr. Morris Marx, who has been in charge of the work of this department for the last seven years, has been working overtime two nights each week for the last nine months to facilitate the work. No extra compensation is allowed him for his time. To properly carry out the law of naturalization he has examined each and every petition, attended all court hearings, verified each and every certificate issued out of this court and all other matters pertaining to the duties of his office. I think you will agree with me that my naturalization department has been a credit to the service, and in checking up the work done you will find fewer errors for the column of business done than any other naturalization department in the country.

I am two years behind in indexing my petitions, and it is very necessary that it be kept up to date. The courtesy extended to the public by this department has made it very popular with the labor and fraternal organizations of the city.

In conclusion, I am asking for $8,100 in addition to the $3,000 allowed by law, making a total of $11,100. There is employed now and paid out of the revenue of $3,000 the following clerks:

1 chief naturalization clerk	$1,800
1 senior naturalization clerk	1,500
1 junior naturalization clerk	1,200
	4,500

of which the county pays $1,500 in addition to the $3,000 allowed by law. No allowances for salaries of judges is included in the above or postage, printing, etc.

The $8,100 I would like to distribute in the following manner:

2 senior naturalization clerks, $1,500 each	$3,000
1 stenographer	1,500
3 junior clerks, $1,200 each	3,600
	8,100

Hoping that due consideration be given my requests, I beg to remain,

Yours, very truly,

RICHARD J. MCGRATH, Clerk.

P. S.—Total receipts for the fiscal year up to April 30, 1914, $22,373.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 68 and insert in lieu thereof this amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Louisiana be permitted to offer amendments to all three sections before disposing of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Louisiana be permitted to offer amendments to all three of these sections before disposing of any of them. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Now, if they are to be passed over, I wish the gentleman would ask unanimous consent that they may be printed in the RECORD without reading at this time and then pass the sections.

Mr. WATKINS. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] asks unanimous consent that these amendments offered to sections 68 and 69, and other amendments, be printed in the RECORD, the last two without reading. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following are the amendments:

3. Amendment offered by Mr. WATKINS:

"SEC. 69. That the necessary office expenses of the clerks of the United States district courts shall be allowed when authorized by the Attorney General. And when in the opinion of the Attorney General the public interest requires it, he may, on the recommendation of the clerk, which recommendation shall state the facts as distinguished from conclusions showing necessity for the same, allow the clerk to employ necessary deputies and clerical assistants, upon salaries to be fixed by the Attorney General from time to time and paid as hereinafter provided. When any such deputy or clerical assistant is necessarily absent from the place of his regular employment on official business, he shall be allowed his actual traveling expenses only, and his necessary and actual expenses for lodging and subsistence, not to exceed $3 per day. And he shall make and render accounts thereof quarterly, in accordance with such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Attorney General, and shall be verified on oath before any officer authorized to administer oaths: Provided, That said accounts for expenses shall have attached thereto the certificate of the clerk that the expenses charged were incurred by the deputy or clerical assistant when necessarily absent from the place of his regular employment on official business. The expense accounts of the deputies or clerical assistants, when made out and certified in accordance with this act, shall be paid by the marshal, who shall make such return thereof as may be prescribed by the Attorney General."

Mr. WATKINS. The Chair understands that this request covers the fact that they are to be inserted in the RECORD. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] request that they be read at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asked unanimous consent that they be printed without reading, and that the sections be passed.

Mr. WINGO. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. Do I understand that there have been several amendments under that agreement proposed, and that they will be inserted in the RECORD without being read or acted on at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. They asked unanimous consent to do that, and it was granted, and that they be not acted on at this time.

Mr. WINGO. My understanding of the unanimous-consent proposition, and I watched it very closely, was that they were to be offered to the three paragraphs at once.

Mr. MADDEN. There has been another request since that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD without reading.

Mr. MANN. I suggested to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] that he ask unanimous consent that they be printed without reading and passed over.

Mr. WATKINS. That was included in the request and was granted by unanimous consent.

Mr. WINGO. Now, what is the parliamentary status, Mr. Chairman, of those paragraphs?

The CHAIRMAN. They will be printed in the RECORD and hereafter taken up for action.

Mr. WINGO. What is the parliamentary status of the sections to which the amendments are offered? Are they passed over for the time being?

The CHAIRMAN. They are passed over by unanimous consent. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 88. The salaries provided by sections 20, 59, 61, and 72 of this chapter shall be paid monthly by the Department of Justice.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. To what section?

Mr. STAFFORD. Section 88.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, if I can be recognized without interrupting the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] has asked unanimous consent to strike out the last word of section 88.

Mr. WATKINS. I understand that is simply a pro forma amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment, to be pending in connection with these other amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 54, line 2, after the word "sixty-one," insert "sixty-eight."

Mr. WATKINS. The object of the amendment is to act in concert with the other amendments which have been deferred, and for that reason I will ask that this amendment be deferred for action, the same as the amendments to sections 67, 68, and 69.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks to pass that section over?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that this section 88 be passed over, to be considered in connection with sections 67, 68, and 69. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DENT having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4377) to provide for the construction of four revenue cutters, had insisted upon its amendment to the amendment of the House No. 3, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. RANSDELL, and Mr. NELSON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

S. 4096. An act to amend the act authorizing the National Academy of Sciences to receive and hold trust funds for the promotion of science, and for other purposes; and

S. 4632. An act for the relief of settlers on the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, in the State of North Dakota, and the Cheyenne River and Standing Rock Indian Reservations, in the States of South Dakota and North Dakota.

The message also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On May 14, 1914:

S. 540. An act for the relief of Joseph Hodges.

On May 15, 1914:

S. 4158. An act to reduce the fire limit required by the act approved March 4, 1913, in respect to the proposed Federal building at Salisbury, Md.

REVISION OF THE LAWS—JUDICIARY TITLE.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 89. Nothing in this chapter shall be so construed as to prevent or affect the amount or taxation of costs against the unsuccessful party in civil proceedings or against defendants convicted of crimes or misdemeanors.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 54, line 4, after the word "this," strike out "chapter" and insert the word "act."

Mr. WATKINS. There is no objection to the amendment.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, there is no objection to it. It is just a perfection of the language.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 90. Any officer whose compensation is fixed by this chapter who shall directly or indirectly demand, receive, or accept any fee or compensation for the performance of any official service other than as herein provided, or shall willfully fail or neglect to account for or pay over to the proper officer or person any fee received or collected by him shall be fined not less than $50, nor more than $500, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] offers a committee amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 54, line 13, after the word "shall," insert a comma and the words "upon conviction thereof."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, may we have that reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report it again.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. I do so for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] whether he is sure the amendment that he offered to section 89 was correct. The language in the bill is that "nothing in this chapter shall be so construed as to prevent or affect the amount or taxation of costs against the unsuccessful party in civil proceedings or against defendants convicted of crimes or misdemeanors." That has been changed from "chapter" to "act," so that it stands, "nothing in this act shall be so construed as to prevent or affect the amount or taxation of costs against the unsuccessful party in civil proceedings or against defendants convicted of crimes or misdemeanors." Is that correct?

Mr. TOWNER. I think so, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, for this reason: Of course, this act will only be a part of the chapter.

Mr. MANN. No; the chapter is part of the act. The act is the whole thing. This bill, which is referred to when you refer to it as an act, is divided into chapters. There are a number of chapters in the act. We are now proceeding with chapter 1. It may be correct. I do not say that it is not.

Mr. TOWNER. It can be changed if it is not.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

All witness fees and costs of every nature in cases of extradition, including the fees of the commissioner, shall be certified by the judge or commissioner before whom the hearing shall take place to the Attorney General of the United States, who is hereby authorized to allow the payment thereof out of the appropriation to defray the expenses of the judiciary; and the Attorney General shall thereupon certify to the Secretary of State the amount of such fees and costs so allowed, and the Secretary of State shall cause the same to be reimbursed to the Government of the United States by the foreign Government by whom the proceedings for extradition may have been instituted. Each commissioner shall keep a complete record of all proceedings before him in criminal cases, in a well-bound book, which record book shall be delivered to and preserved by the clerk of the district court for such district on the death, resignation, removal, or expiration of term of the commissioner, for which record the commissioner shall receive no compensation. Commissioners shall not be entitled to any fees not enumerated in this section, except as provided in section twenty-nine hundred and thirty-four.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to correct the number there.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 59, line 6, after the word "section" by striking out the words "twenty-nine hundred and thirty-four" and inserting "twenty-two hundred and ninety-four of the Revised Statutes."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. The section which has just been read carries an enumeration of many fees for commissioners of the United States courts. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether in this codification—and I assume there is not—there is any provision made for fees to referees in bankruptcy? There has been recently called to my attention the fact that referees in bankruptcy are receiving larger salaries in some instances than the judges of the United States district courts.

I recognize that it is not the province of the committee to introduce substantive legislation on subject matter that is not incorporated in the present law. I assume that the committee has not taken jurisdiction of that subject. That should be given some consideration by the Committee on the Judiciary of the House.

Mr. WATKINS. I will state to the gentleman that it will probably be some time before that feature of the law is reached in regular order in the codification. There is nothing in this codification about it.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is nothing in this bill referring to the fees to which referees in bankruptcy are entitled?

Mr. WATKINS. No. We have not reached that stage yet.

Mr. STAFFORD. In what bill would that be incorporated?

Mr. WATKINS. It would probably have a separate and distinct chapter on the question of bankruptcy alone. A number of features relating to bankruptcy would properly take up an entire chapter. But we have not reached that yet.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the committee what other topics are not covered in this bill that relate to the judiciary? I was under the impression that this concluded all matters relating to the judiciary, taken in connection with the bill passed three years ago.

Mr. WATKINS. Well, so far as the question of procedure goes, the gentleman is correct—judicial procedure. But we did not take up all the different propositions of law, like the Army and Navy, and so on.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course the gentleman will recognize that fees with reference to bankruptcy are as intimately correlated to this judiciary subject as are the fees of the United States court commissioners and fees of marshals and the like. Referees in bankruptcy are as much an adjunct in the administration of judicial procedure as commissioners and marshals, and the like. Why should that subject not be incorporated in this bill and not in a separate bill?

Mr. WATKINS. Whether it should be or should not be we have not undertaken it; but if the gentleman will prepare and introduce a bill along that line of thought and have it referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws we can assure him that we will give it careful consideration, and if we can properly do it we will incorporate it in this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. If I should do so, I think it would not be referred properly to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, but to the Committee on the Judiciary. I think the subject should be considered in connection with this bill if we are going to incorporate everything concerning procedure in this measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be considered withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

STENOGRAPHERS' FEES.

SEC. 93. Stenographers of the district court shall receive such salaries as the Attorney General shall from time to time determine, which shall be payable monthly upon the certificate of the judge that they have performed the duties of their said office during the month for which such salary is claimed. The salary shall be full compensation for all services performed on behalf of the United States and the judge of said court. They may also collect and receive from any party requiring a transcript of the testimony and proceedings, or any part thereof, upon a trial or hearing, the sum of 10 cents per folio for the same.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 59, line 13, after the word "salaries," insert the words "or compensation"; on line 16, after the word "salary," insert the words "or compensation"; on line 17, after the word "salary," insert the words "or compensation."

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Chairman, it is very often the case in the district courts that the regular stenographer is absent. We have provided under section 55 of this bill a provision that at such times an additional temporary stenographer shall be employed. This simply provides that the Attorney General shall fix the compensation of the temporary stenographer. Under section 55 the temporary stenographer is paid at the same rate as the regular stenographer. This language that I have offered, it seems to me, would permit fixing the amount more easily than if it were not in this section of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDER. I will.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman wants to make provision for the payment of a temporary salary.

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. But this provision is for the payment of stenographers by the month.

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. As a salary?

Mr. CALDER. Yes. The temporary stenographer may work for a month or he may work for a week.

Mr. MANN. It is to be payable monthly, though. It plainly refers to annual salaries.

Mr. SCOTT. Stenographers of the district courts, referring to the official stenographers. If the gentleman wants to cover what he has indicated, it really ought to be in a separate amendment.

Mr. MANN. However, that would not settle the difficulty, if the gentleman's amendment should be inserted.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Chairman, I only want to add this, that it might be covered in another way; but it would seem to me by inserting these words, which would cover the matter, it would enable the Attorney General to pay these men. There is no other provision in the bill that I have seen which would enable them to be paid.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will return to section 55, which he refers to——

Mr. CALDER. I have looked at that.

Mr. STAFFORD. He will find that the stenographers pro tempore are to receive the same compensation during the time of their employment as the regular stenographer.

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The stenographer pro tempore would be paid pro rata, according to the number of days he served, which amount would be deducted from the salary of the regular stenographer.

Mr. CALDER. Does the gentleman think that under the language of the amendment as reported from the committee the matter is fully covered?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am of the opinion that the suggestion of the gentleman would be an improvement rather than a detriment to the present phraseology.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from New York has in mind a case where the official stenographer does not happen to be present, and they call in another stenographer. But that case is not provided for in this bill at all.

Mr. WATKINS. Begging the gentleman's pardon, if he will turn back to section 55——

Mr. MANN. I have that section right before me, and am going to read it:

The stenographer—

That is, the official stenographer—

shall attend to the duties of his office in person, except when excused for good and sufficient reason by order of the court, which order must be entered upon the minutes of the court.

Now that is not a mere temporary absence of the stenographer. There must be reasons presented to the court for employing another stenographer in his place, and if that case arises the temporary stenographer receives the compensation or the salary which has been fixed for the official stenographer, and the official stenographer gets nothing during that time. But how are you going to fix a salary for a stenographer of the district court, where he may be engaged all the time, with a force of assistants taking and transcribing the testimony and the other proceedings of the court? We provide in the House here a number of official stenographers. We provide, in addition, pay for their helpers who transcribe their notes, and while in some respects it may be harder to take the proceedings of the House during five or six hours a day than it is to take the testimony, arguments, and other proceedings of a hotly contested lawsuit, sometimes during longer hours, yet in some respects it is no harder.

One stenographer in such a case, so reported and transcribed, might begin, but he would be followed by others. Now, how are you going to provide in Chicago a salary of $30,000 or $40,000 or $50,000 a year for the stenographers of one of the district courts? Undoubtedly that amount is now paid to the stenographers who take and transcribe the testimony if they are all included. But you can not provide a salary of that kind. I do not see how you are going to get it done. Fortunately we inserted in this bill the other day a provision leaving it optional with the judge to appoint a stenographer; but the gentleman knows very well that it takes a number of stenographers and a number of typewriting assistants, in addition, to take and transcribe daily the testimony day after day in a lawsuit in a court that is sitting all the time.

Mr. CALDER. If the gentleman will pardon me. I know he follows these things more closely than I do, but I offered this amendment at the suggestion of one of our district judges in New York, and that judge says:

Under section 55 a temporary stenographer may be appointed, and the necessary absence of the official stenographer would be sufficient cause. But where one or two temporary stenographers should be busy their payment and even that of the official stenographer might have to be fixed by some other rate than yearly salaries divided into 12 parts.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but the gentleman's amendment does not do that. The gentleman's amendment only provides in effect for yearly salaries; salary or compensation, what is the difference? It is to be something fixed by the Attorney General, payable monthly, and would not take care of these emergency cases, except where the official stenographer, by order of the court, was set to one side and a temporary stenographer appointed in his place.

Mr. WILLIS. Does the gentleman think the Attorney General is the appropriate authority to fix these salaries? Why should the Attorney General be given that power?

Mr. MANN. The head of the Department of Justice is given the power, and I think properly, to name the salaries all the way through in the Department of Justice. It is done upon representations that may be made, probably in this case by the court.

Mr. WILLIS. Would it not be safer to grant that power to the court?

Mr. MANN. I think not. I do not think it is safe to grant to any local authority the power to fix salaries, because they would not have any conception of the relative proportion of salaries in different places for the same work.

Mr. WILLIS. Does not the gentleman think it would be practicable to work out a graduated scheme of fees so that we can provide what the salary shall be? I do not like the idea of granting to anybody, particularly the head of a department, authority to fix salaries.

Mr. MANN. We do that everywhere.

Mr. WILLIS. I know we do; but we ought not to do it any more than is absolutely necessary.

Mr. MANN. A legislative body can not undertake to do these things; it is too great an undertaking.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York ought to be adopted. It might be that the courts would fix the compensation for the temporary stenographer, and it may be that it would be included under the head of salary in the interpretation that the courts would put upon it. But it is safer, I think, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York should be adopted.

Section 93 provides that a stenographer shall be appointed and his salary shall be fixed. Section 55 provides that temporary stenographers shall be appointed in case the regular stenographer is not present, and that his compensation shall be the same during the time he works as that which is given or fixed by the Attorney General for the regular stenographer. Now, the word "salary," used in section 93, refers only to the compensation paid to the regular stenographer. The word "compensation" added would cover the temporary appointee and make the statute in conformity with what really is intended, and in harmony with section 55. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from New York will be adopted.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make some brief observations on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York. If this section is to stand in substantially this form, the amendment proposed ought to be adopted.

But I want to call the attention of the committee to what seems to me to be a questionable thing to do. This same matter was up two weeks ago when this section was referred to. It does not seem to me that it is the best way to settle this question. Here we are proposing to give to the head of a department, to the Attorney General, the authority to fix salaries. I have no amendment prepared, but it seems to me that an amendment could and ought to be drafted that would deal with this subject in some other way than the one here proposed.

For example, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has referred to the very efficient stenographers of the House. My understanding is that their compensation is fixed by law. I do not believe that it would be wise to say that the compensation of the House stenographers should be fixed even by the Speaker or by some other officer of the House, although we have perfect confidence in all the officers of the House and in the stenographers. I do not think it is good public policy. It seems to me that there ought to be some plan worked out whereby there should be a scale of fees, so that we could avoid as far as possible vesting in the head of a department authority to fix the salaries of employees in that department.

The gentleman from Illinois has very properly called attention to the fact that we do that all the time. We do, of course, to some extent, and necessarily so. There are some cases where we can not handle the question satisfactorily in any other way. We have to trust the head of a department to fix compensation in a few instances. But it seems to me in this sort of a case, where the employment is not incidental, or even occasional, that it would be entirely feasible to work out a system of fixed compensation so that we would not be placed in the embarrassing position of saying to the head of a department: In addition to your administrative and quasi-judicial duties you are required to do a thing that Congress ought to do—fix the salaries—a legislative and not an administrative function. I believe, wherever it is possible to do so, the law itself ought to provide what the salaries of governmental employees shall be. I wonder whether the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] would be willing to pass over the section for the present. I have no amendment prepared, and I do not know whether I can prepare one, but somebody can. Would the gentleman be willing to pass this section over without prejudice and let some one work out an amendment along the lines I have indicated?

Mr. WATKINS. I will state to the gentleman that we have already regulated that. It was discussed in the House and amendments were offered, and we have passed over that particular section. I think it is too late in this bill to go into a consideration of that section. I recognize the force of the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio and would have felt glad if we had had the opportunity to insert some new features in the bill, but we did not feel authorized under the restricted powers of the committee to do so.

Mr. WILLIS. If the gentleman feels that way about it, there would be no difficulty in going back to the section. I do not think anyone would object. If the gentleman feels, as I understand him to say, that the committee ought to have worked out something along this line, if the committee felt that it had not the authority to make some provision governing salary along this line, does not the gentleman think it would be very much better to let the section be passed over without prejudice and then ask unanimous consent to return to the other sections involved in this one and allow the whole thing to be worked out? I do not want to be offensive, but it seems to me the system provided in the bill is unfair and unreasonable and in some respects entirely unworkable and almost absurd. It is not clear, and nobody can tell what the effect will be. I hope the gentleman will do that, and out of his extended experience and careful investigation of this subject I am sure he and the members of his distinguished committee would be able to work out something which I understand him to admit ought to be worked out. Here in Committee of the Whole House no question of jurisdiction could be raised.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that it is possible for this committee or this Congress, with the knowledge that it has, to fix the salaries of stenographers of courts. Of course, we fix the salaries of the clerks of the courts, or try to, in this bill specifically. We also fix the salaries of the marshals and the judges. But there we have acquired some knowledge, and I should take it that it is very likely, if these salaries were to be fixed salaries, in the end Congress would fix them. In the first instance, however, I doubt whether the Attorney General would be able to fix a salary which he would not in many cases change within a month, and necessarily so. I will ask the gentleman from Louisiana a question. This provision makes the Attorney General fix the salary—call it an annual salary—for the stenographer. It says that that salary shall be full compensation for all services performed on behalf of the United States and the judge of said court. Will not that cover the stenographer's services complete in all cases in which the United States is a party?

Mr. WATKINS. I would think so, but I think there is an erroneous idea with reference to the whole provision concerning stenographers. My idea is not that one man will have to do all of the work.

Mr. MANN. I understand. Of course we know that one man could not do all of the work, but suppose the Attorney General fixed a salary in Chicago, in New York, in Minneapolis, or in New Orleans, or one of the other cities where we have antitrust prosecutions, and a great many criminal cases, and there should be a long case in which the United States is a party, will the official stenographer and his assistants, he being paid a salary fixed by the Attorney General, do all of the stenographic work, transcribe those notes, furnish a copy to the district attorney or to the Attorney General, for his official salary?

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I infer that the Attorney General in fixing the compensation—and I do not have any objection at all to the word "compensation" being inserted—should take into consideration the stenographic work to be done for that court and fix the salary in conformity with that.

Mr. MANN. I am assuming that he does that, but what I am asking is whether the gentleman's understanding is that when that has been fixed it will cover all of the work done by the stenographer and his assistants in behalf of the United States.

Mr. WATKINS. I think so.

Mr. MANN. In Chicago there are two district courts. One of them may be engaged this month in trying criminal cases where the United States is a party. Those cases may run in that court for two or three months before that judge. They may be switched over to another judge at any time. How can the Attorney General tell how to fix the salary of the stenographers in these respective courts? These salaries must be fixed in advance. We will have to make an appropriation with which to pay them.

Mr. WATKINS. He would certainly be as well qualified with the knowledge he has of the work of the courts as Members are.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I quite agree with the gentleman. I think it would be almost impossible for us to do it, but ought there not to be in this bill some provision by which, after a stenographer's salary is fixed, he shall be allowed a fixed compensation in addition, according to the work performed, especially where he is performing work for the United States?

Mr. WATKINS. I think that the authority of the Attorney General would cover the case; that it would be his duty to fix the compensation at such a sum as would cover the necessary work to be done in that court.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think this word "compensation" means a fee compensation?

Mr. WATKINS. No; not in the light of a fee. I think it is intended to be a salary, but at the same time the compensation is to be fixed at such an amount as would cover the necessary expenses incurrred—the work to be done in court.

Mr. MANN. But let us say that there is a trust case which lasts for three months.

Mr. WATKINS. This does not say whether the compensation shall be monthly or annual.

Mr. MANN. Here is a trust case which runs for three months, we will say, where the stenographer has to perform services for the United States. He must transcribe the testimony for the United States, but he receives no compensation for that other than his annual salary fixed in advance before anyone knew or could know that he would be required to do that work for three months—not merely the man himself, but he must have a corps of assistants.

Mr. WATKINS. I do not object to any provision being inserted in the bill that will cover contingencies of that kind; but, in my opinion, the language already used, particularly with the additional expression "compensation," would cover the case so as to safeguard it in every possible way. That is my opinion about it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pending amendment. I think there is an erroneous conception entertained by both the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] in believing that one stenographer will not be able to perform the work arising in the district courts. Those courts can not be any more hard pressed with trial work than are the usual State trial courts, and we all know that there is but one official stenographer who is detailed for that work, and in my own State the salary is limited to $2,400. Those stenographers work 10 months in the year, usually taking a recess only when the court takes a recess, during the summer months.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Do not those stenographers all get paid fees for transcribing all of the testimony where they do that?

Mr. STAFFORD. We provide also in this bill that for transcription of testimony a fee of 10 cents a folio may be collected.

Mr. MANN. Not where it is done for the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. In my State they receive but 5 cents per folio for a transcription, and here we provide 10 cents a folio. The gentleman knows that these offices are sought after by many not only on account of the salary but because of the fees that are connected with them.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows the case he cited does not cover this, because these stenographers are not required to perform a great deal of service for nothing, whereas this bill requires the stenographers to do the work which they do for the Government without additional charge.

Mr. STAFFORD. And yet I believe one stenographer can perform all the work that is necessary for taking stenographic notes of the proceedings of a trial court. Now, in our State courts the court reporters have an assistant whom they pay out of their salary or out of the fees they receive. Now, at the present time there are no official stenographers to United States courts. Through the grace of the judges there have been appointed certain stenographers, who have charged certain fees. Here we are attempting to regulate that and put them on a salary basis, and in addition a fee of 10 cents a folio is provided by this bill. I think this is too high; I think 5 cents per folio is sufficient to be charged for all supplemental work. Now, in answer to the argument made by my friend from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] that we ought at this time to restrict the salaries, it might be well to put a limit on or that they could in any instance receive, but the gentleman recognizes that we could not determine the salaries for these various stenographers, as we have no information, and can not get information, except general information, as to the practice in State courts. He protests against the practice, yet I wish to call attention to the fact that in the case of the rural carriers, who have a political organization of a most potent force, we do not determine the salaries, but fix the salary only for the standard route, and we have done so ever since the service was established; so also with the salaries of the Assistant Attorneys General, we leave their determination to the Attorney General, and certainly in providing a salary for these stenographers we must leave it to the Attorney General to determine the basis before we can legislate as to any fixed salary for these respective officials.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman what consideration was urged upon the committee for providing a different method of compensation to stenographers for the transcripts made for the United States and those made for private parties?

Mr. WATKINS. The only thing that appeared from the outside was that there be a decrease in the pay. Heretofore they have been paid more than we provide in this bill, because we considered to do the work of the court was not worth as much as had been paid heretofore. Outside of that, no particular pressure was brought to bear on the question of compensation.

Mr. SCOTT. It is quite evident some one must make up what is a reasonable compensation for these stenographers. I can conceive of no reason why the United States should not pay for the transcript as well as the private individual; and in that connection it seems to me this section 93 is in a measure ambiguous, because it does not differentiate between the ordinary work of taking notes and the making of the transcript; and the question occurs to me as to whether, during the time the stenographer is writing up the notes—as the gentleman from Illinois has suggested, it might take two or three weeks or a month—whether or not during that time he will draw his court per diem?

Mr. WATKINS. Oh, he would not have any per diem at all; he would be getting a salary all the time.

Mr. SCOTT. Then, in the case of work for the United States, he would be writing up the notes upon a salary?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCOTT. Then of course he would draw that compensation, but of course we all know that court stenographers make a great deal more during the time they are writing up the transcript than they do while they are taking the notes. It occurs to me it might be a good thing to strike out "United States" from that second sentence and only include in the category the judge of the court and let the United States pay for the transcript the same as anybody else.

Mr. WATKINS. Why, the United States is not in the habit of paying extra to various officials of the Government, like marshals, United States attorneys, clerks, stenographers, who do work on salaries. They are getting their pay by salary from the Government. If they should charge up to the Government and put that in their account and it should be verified afterwards by any of the officials required to do that, it would simply be tautology, because no fees are paid by the Government for those services. There are fees charged individuals and corporations for having work done in the courts, but when the Government has to pay there is no use in making an accounting at all.

Mr. SCOTT. Of course the individual pays for the transcript, and he pays for it on account of the work which is done during the time the stenographer is drawing his salary from the Government. If a stenographer utilizes one month of his time getting out transcript for me, he collects his salary during that month from the Government just the same——

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; that fee is paid into the Government Treasury, and he does not get anything except his salary.

Mr. SCOTT. Oh, he certainly does. This section says they may also collect and receive from any party requiring a transcript of the testimony and proceedings, or any part thereof, upon a trial or hearing, the sum of 10 cents per folio for the same.

Mr. WATKINS. I stand corrected on that proposition. I had in view the clerks' salaries at the time I answered that question.

Mr. SCOTT. In the last analysis, Mr. Chairman, it simply amounts to this: That private litigants have to make up the deficit out of their pockets to pay for transcripts made for the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 59, line 22, strike out the period and insert a comma and add the following: "And for each additional copy, the sum of 5 cents per folio."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, this simply is intended to cover the well-understood use of carbon copies. Frequently, in ordering a transcript, when numerous counsel represent one side of the case, two or three and even four or five copies are called for, depending upon the importance of the matter, and when a number of copies are used the expense becomes quite burdensome upon the litigants; and it also awards an unusual and very large compensation for the stenographer. It seems to me that 5 cents for the additional copies would be equitable and just.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was under the impression that the gentleman was going to offer an amendment to reduce the price per folio from 10 cents, as provided in the bill, to 5 cents. Can the gentleman inform the committee what the rate is in his State in the courts where stenographers are employed? In my State it is 5 cents. Now, we should try at least to reduce the cost to litigants in these cases and permit appeals more readily, so that the cost and expense will not be great. I would like to have the gentleman's opinion as to the rate in his State, because I thought the practice there was to reduce those charges.

Mr. SCOTT. In my State the practice has resolved itself to 20 cents per page for the transcript, and the page usually includes just about 200 words.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is that a matter of statute fee, or merely a matter of practice?

Mr. SCOTT. That is a matter of practice. And where additional copies are ordered we generally get them at half price. In fact, I arrived at my conclusion in preparing these amendments from the practice prevailing in my State, and I think it prevails very largely over the country, except in the large cities. I know that when we go to Chicago we have to pay for every copy and pay a very large fee. I presume that custom also prevails in other large cities, and I think that this amendment would tend to be more equitable and just.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would the gentleman be willing to support an amendment providing for a cost per folio of 5 cents per copy?

Mr. SCOTT. All through?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. No; I do not believe that would meet the situation hardly. I think that would be rather small.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that, so far as the committee is concerned, we have no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SCOTT].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. STAFFORD. I move to strike out the word "ten" in line 21, page 59, and insert "five."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 59, line 21, strike out the word "ten" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have already directed the attention of the committee to the purpose of this amendment in the remarks that I made in questioning the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SCOTT]. I think it should be our policy to relieve litigants of the expense attendant in cases of appeal. In our State we have positively found that the cost of 10 cents per folio was rather high. The court reporters were making exorbitant fees, and upon thorough investigation we passed a statute, which I have before me, making the price per folio 5 cents per copy.

Now, we are leaving it to the discretion of the Attorney General to fix the salaries of these stenographers. We can rest assured that those salaries will be compensatory for their services, and, in addition thereto, we are granting to these stenographers the right to charge a certain fee for the transcript of their notes—10 cents per folio. Now, I respectfully appeal to the chairman of the committee that we should not try to make this rate so high that it will be a burden upon litigants. It certainly should be our policy to have the Federal Government bear the expense of the stenographers' salaries, which we leave by this section to the discretion of the Attorney General, and lift the burden from the litigants. For, if these fees are large—and it is admitted that 10 cents is high—they will be borne by the litigants and not by the National Government.

Mr. LLOYD. Certainly it can not be said that 10 cents is a large fee, Mr. Chairman. Ten cents is a small fee, as is shown by examination of all the courts of the country. The work of stenographers in this city and in New York and in other places will show you that 10 cents a folio is not unreasonable. And right here in the House of Representatives we are paying 15 cents, and until very recently we paid a good deal more than that.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the cases before the House and the House committees there is not the demand from outside, or rarely is there a demand, for additional copies.

Mr. LLOYD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. There is a good deal of demand from the outside.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are certain instances where there is demand. For instance, in connection with the House lobby investigating committee.

Mr. LLOYD. We provide, as was provided by the amendment just enacted, for 5 cents a folio when there is more than one copy. That is certainly a reasonable proposition; that provides 10 cents per folio for the first copy and 5 cents for each additional copy, and that is the proposition as it now stands in the proposed law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman recognize that the burden of maintaining the court should be borne by the taxpayers and not by the litigants? When you are charging them 10 cents a folio you are putting upon them an expense that should be borne by the Government itself.

Mr. LLOYD. There is no reason at all why the stenographer should not have a reasonable compensation.

Mr. STAFFORD. We provide in this bill that they should have a salary determined by the Attorney General, and in addition to that you are going to give them an additional fee, which I claim, from my standpoint, as found in our practice in Wisconsin, is rather high.

Mr. LLOYD. Whenever they render outside work they ought to have outside pay. There is no question about that, and you do not dispute it.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is merely a perquisite. And in the trial of cases in the United States courts there are many instances where there is more than one transcript required. It is different from the practice in the House committees. We found upon investigation that 10 cents was too large. Does the gentleman think that the salary as prescribed by the Attorney General will be less than $2,400? That is the statutory salary in Wisconsin, and now I am only trying to apply the same rule. We found that to relieve the burden on litigants in cases of appeal, both in criminal and civil cases, the fee should be but 5 cents. Now we leave it to the Attorney General to fix their salary. Why should you not, then, grant to litigants as low a cost as is compatible with the practices of the office?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, down in Kentucky they pay the stenographers, as provided by law, 25 cents a folio.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. MANN. Not 25 cents a folio of 100 words?

Mr. POWERS. Twenty-five cents a page.

Mr. MANN. Yes; that is different. This is by the folio, and 100 words make a folio. That is different from a page.

Mr. POWERS. It is 25 cents a page in Kentucky. I do not know what it takes to make a page.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. POWERS. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. I will say to the gentleman that not long ago I paid 25 cents a folio for a transcript here in Washington.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no law applying to these cases in Washington.

Mr. POWERS. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the Attorney General ought not to have the power to fix these salaries, because that is properly left to the local conditions; and it seems to me to be wiser that the matter should be fixed by law.

I would like, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, we have made as careful an investigation as we possibly could with the light before us, and on investigation we ascertained that it is customary to pay anywhere from 15 to 20 cents in the District of Columbia and other places in the United States courts where the transcripts are made out at so much per folio.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Louisiana yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Was not that predicated upon the idea that the stenographers got no salary at all? Now, we are providing that the Attorney General shall provide them with a fixed salary. In addition to that, you are proposing to allow them 10 cents a folio. In places where this plan has been tried 5 cents has been found to be adequate, and you should not put that burden upon litigants.

Mr. WATKINS. That was the compensation that was paid for work that was done. Fifteen cents is the amount that is customary to be paid, and from that on up to 20 cents a folio. We have placed the amount at about one-half of what is paid in the courts. We feel that 10 cents is the proper amount to be fixed in the bill. I think the amendment should be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 13, noes 18.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to make the point of no quorum, but a majority of that vote was out of the Chamber when the merits of this amendment were discussed.

Mr. GARNER. But we got them in. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. We just had an interesting discussion in the committee on a matter of considerable importance. There was no one on the Democratic side—not many—to speak of during the discussion, although it was ably represented by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS], and we had a vote. The gentlemen who listened to the discussion, according to the Chair—and the Chair was right when he declared that the ayes had it—voted in favor of the amendment, but out of the vaults, the rooms, and the underground passages, the smoking rooms, and off the lounges came half-awakened, still sleepy gentlemen who, not having heard the discussion and knowing nothing whatever about the pending matter, voted on the Democratic side. That is the way people who do not know anything about a thing usually vote. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Do you suppose they would have voted differently if they had been in here and heard the discussion?

Mr. MANN. Certainly. Some of the Democrats voted favorably on that proposition. I will not say they voted with this side of the House; but some of them voted for it. But the sleepy ones, who were awakened and pulled off the lounges and brought into the Chamber, voted "no." That is the way a Democratic House legislates. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WITNESS'S FEES.

SEC. 95. For each day's attendance in court or before any officer, pursuant to law, $1.50, and 5 cents a mile for going from his place of residence to the place of trial or hearing, and 5 cents a mile for returning: Provided, That witnesses in the United States courts in the States of Wyoming, Montana, Washington, Oregon, California, Nevada, Idaho, Colorado, Utah, New Mexico, and Arizona shall be entitled to and receive $3 per day for actual attendance at any court and for the time necessarily occupied in going to and returning from the same, and 15 cents for each mile necessarily traveled over any stage line or by private conveyance, and 5 cents for each mile over any railway in going to and returning from said courts: Provided, That no constructive or double mileage fees shall be allowed by reason of any person being summoned both as witness and juror, or as witness in two or more cases pending in the same court and triable at the same term thereof. When a witness is subpœnaed in more than one case between the same parties, at the same court, only one travel fee and one per diem compensation shall be allowed for attendance. Both shall be taxed in the case first disposed of, after which the per diem attendance fee alone shall be taxed in the other cases in the order in which they are disposed of. When a witness is detained in prison for want of security for his appearance, he shall be entitled, in addition to his subsistence, to a compensation of $1 a day.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, when the paragraph relating to criers and bailiffs was read I was not paying very much attention to it, and I would like to ask unanimous consent to go back to that paragraph for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] asks unanimous consent to return to section 94 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 25, page 59, by striking out the word "three" and inserting the word "four." That would make it read "$4 a day" instead of "$3 a day."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 59, line 25, strike out the word "three" and insert in lieu thereof the word "four."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in offering this amendment is to call attention to what I think is a glaring injustice to the men who are employed as bailiffs, but who are in reality doing the work of United States marshals.

In cities like New York and Chicago we have a number of men appointed by the marshal, but who are really classed as bailiffs, while in effect they are United States marshals, and do all the work that devolves upon the marshal, and have all the responsibility and are required to give the same kind of a bond, and are constantly at work, not only during the day but frequently at night in business districts like the northern district of Illinois and the southern district of New York, and other great districts of the country——

Mr. CALDER. And the eastern district of New York.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; and in the eastern district of New York and districts in Massachusetts and districts in Louisiana and districts in all great centers of population throughout the United States. These men are paid only $70 per month. This $3 a day in effect amounts to $70 a month; at any rate, $70 a month is the compensation which these men are paid. It is not fair, it is not decent, to ask men to occupy these responsible places at any such compensation. It is not enough to enable them to keep their families, to educate their children, to live like men who are obliged to clothe themselves as they are obliged to clothe or to live.

In the local courts of the States we pay the bailiffs in no case less than $105 a month, and we pay deputy sheriffs, which would be equivalent to a marshal, from $150 to $200 per month. But in great centers like Chicago, where these men are doing not only the work of the bailiff but are serving all the papers and making all the arrests and are responsible for the work of the courts usually imposed upon marshals, these men are getting the beggarly compensation of $70 a month. I have had this matter called to my attention for a long time, and while serving on the Appropriations Committee of the House some years ago I tried to remedy the difficulty, but was unable to do it through that committee. This is the first opportunity which has presented itself where the evil can be remedied, and it ought to be remedied, as every man will agree who has given any consideration whatever to the question. We ought not to employ men in these responsible places at the beggarly compensation of $70 a month, and require them to give a bond, and require them to take their lives in their hands frequently in making arrests of desperate men, also serving writs in important cases, and remaining out to all hours of the night after being on duty all day. I think every man in this House will agree that that is not just to these men and it is not fair to the Government. It is rather restricting the efficiency of the force that is employed when we say to men of this class that they are to be paid only $70 a month. I grant you that in some cases the work of the crier or bailiff is not continuous. Whether that be true or not I am unable to say, but in great centers of population, where these men are employed in large numbers, there are no hours. There is no limitation of the day's work. The day's work consists of every hour of the twenty-four when they are called upon or needed, and I submit to the Members who are here that the compensation they now receive is not fair to them.

Mr. LLOYD. Does the gentleman understand that these men only get pay for the days they work?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know whether they get paid only for just the days they work or not.

Mr. MANN. That is all.

Mr. MADDEN. I know they do not get enough compensation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LLOYD. The gentleman said they got $70 a month.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what they get.

Mr. LLOYD. I think the gentleman must be mistaken about that. They only get $3 a day for the days they actually serve. Now, possibly the gentleman has reference to his State courts and not to Federal courts.

Mr. MADDEN. No; I have reference to the district courts of the United States, and to the men employed under the marshal.

Mr. LLOYD. Under this statute they receive $3 per day for the days they actually serve.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand that is what it says.

Mr. LLOYD. If they work 26 days in the month they get $78, and if they only work 15 days they get only $45.

Mr. MADDEN. In Chicago they work every day in the month, and the amount they actually get for the work they do is $70 a month. How they divide it up I do not know.

Mr. LLOYD. I do not see how they can make it exactly $70 a month and work an even number of days.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know on what basis they make it, but they do make it.

Mr. LLOYD. That would be twenty-three and one-third days.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; and they work every day—Sunday, Monday, and every other day. They have no holidays, and they not only work every day, but they work nights, if necessary.

Mr. MANN. If my colleague will permit, during the vacation of the court they are laid off. They do not get paid as court criers or bailiffs.

Mr. MADDEN. But they are acting as deputy marshals.

Mr. MANN. They may be paid as deputy marshals, and that may be used as a subterfuge to get around the law, because of the onerousness of the provision, and that is a reason why the present law should be changed.

Mr. MADDEN. I think it ought to be changed, so that reasonable, decent compensation may be paid to men of this class, and I hope the Committee on Revision of the Laws will see the necessity and justice of changing the present provision.

Mr. DILLON. While the gentleman is discussing the proposition of the bailiffs serving papers and acting as deputy marshals, I will ask him if they do not get paid in the form of fees for that service?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. DILLON. For performing service as deputy marshals.

Mr. MADDEN. No, sir. They get no fees of any kind, name, or nature for the services they render. They only get one kind of pay, and that is the pay they get per month. They do get mileage if they go away from home. If they take a prisoner to Fort Leavenworth from Chicago, they are allowed $2 a day, and that is all.

Mr. DILLON. As a matter of fact, does not every deputy marshal who serves a paper get paid for the service of that paper?

Mr. MADDEN. No; in a place like Chicago or New York they do not. They do in some country places where the marshals are paid altogether by fees.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, no; Congress put an end to the fee system some years ago because of the great abuses that there were under that system.

Mr. MADDEN. These men get no fees. They only get their pay, as I have stated.

Mr. PAYNE. We abolished the fee system because deputy marshals would make complaints in order to get the fees.

Mr. CALDER. I should like to advise the gentleman and the committee that in the city of New York the criers in our State courts are paid $1,600 and $1,800 a year. They are civil-service employees under the State; but right across the street in the Federal building men doing exactly the same kind of work are paid, as the gentleman says, in the neighborhood of $70 a month.

Mr. MADDEN. Why, it is outrageous.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman to be talking about bailiffs. What are the duties of these people?

Mr. MADDEN. They have the same duties as the marshal performs.

Mr. DONOVAN. No; they do not; their duties are fixed.

Mr. MADDEN. The marshal's duties are imposed on the men I am describing.

Mr. DONOVAN. Is it not true that the bailiffs are only ornaments, they do not have to do any thinking? I ask the gentleman if that is not the fact.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Connecticut would not make that statement if he knew what he was talking about.

Mr. DONOVAN. I am trying to find out from the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. These men not only act as bailiffs, but they perform the duties of marshals.

Mr. DONOVAN. The bailiff or the crier does not have to do anything; they do not have to do any thinking, is not that true?

Mr. MADDEN. No; it is not true.

Mr. DONOVAN. What duty does a bailiff perform that requires intellect?

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will sit down, I will tell him. [Laughter.] In the first place, the bailiff in the court that I am describing——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MADDEN. I do not yield, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois declines to yield.

Mr. DONOVAN. I have not asked him to yield. I did not know but I would raise the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say for the information of the gentleman from Connecticut that the men I have described are men of intelligence, men of education, men of experience, men who must have knowledge of how to meet men and how to serve papers and how to make returns—how to do all the things that a wise, clean, forceful business man would require of the best man he has in his office. They are not only men who cry "The court is open" and "The court is closed," but wait in attendance on the judge, serve writs, make arrests, take prisoners to the penitentiary, and do everything that can be done by a man who is charged with responsibility in performing the duties devolving upon a United States marshal. They ought to be paid a decent compensation not only for the work they do but for the responsibility they assume.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment is pending.

Mr. DONOVAN. I think the gentleman from Illinois is imposing upon us. He undertakes to tell us that a petty official of a court has all the duties of a marshal to perform and, so fixed by statute, the duty that a marshal and a sheriff may have to perform. I feel sorry for the gentleman to take that advantage of us. The statute does not provide any such duties for a bailiff; it does not provide any such duty for a crier. I am willing to agree that $3 a day is a small sum for anybody to live on in these times, especially the condition that the Republicans left the country in. Three dollars will not go a great way; but for the gentleman from Illinois to tell us that it requires a graduate of a university—that it requires some intellect—to handle the business of a bailiff or crier is imposing on the good nature of his associates. I think perhaps he is trifling with them.

Mr. MADDEN. I was appealing to the intelligence of the gentleman from Connecticut; I am sorry that he has not got the intelligence that I assumed he had.

Mr. DONOVAN. If I was from Chicago, I might have as much intelligence as the gentleman from Illinois. He can not find in the statutes or any act of Congress anything fixing such duties for the crier or bailiff. Therefore I say he is attempting to impose on us. Now, if the gentleman can quote from any statute a line showing that a bailiff is charged with those duties, I will cheerfully vote with him. But there is not a line in the book from one end to the other that fixes any such duties.

We have officials around here, and what do they do from the time they come in in the morning until they go out at night? They warm chair seats. [Laughter.] They stand on the floor and look us over for a few moments, then go to the side room and occupy another space with a chair. That is practically the duty of the officials you speak of. They are chair warmers without doubt.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, it is the policy of the committee that reported this bill to as far as possible observe the rules of economy, and in pursuance of that the committee, in conformity with their duty as they understood it, have not entered upon a program of increasing fees or salaries. The fees of jurors are fixed at $3 a day. The juror's service is just as onerous and requires as great intelligence as that of the crier or bailiff. The duty of a crier or bailiff of a court is very limited. The committee does not feel that it would be proper to begin to increase the fees for the various officials, and we find this statute of many years' standing, and so far as we know there has never been any complaint raised at all. I understand that the gentleman has had some complaints in reference to the matter; but as a Member of the House of Representatives, having had experience with the court for a number of years before I came here, and being a member of the committee reporting this bill, keeping in touch as well as I could with the various committees of the House, including the Judiciary Committee, which is in direct touch with the Department of Justice at all times, I have never heard any request to have the per diem of these bailiffs raised until this morning. I feel that we ought to let it remain as it is in the statute. Let me say that the salary of the bailiffs was raised only a few years back from $2.50 to $3.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know very much about the duties of a bailiff or a crier except what we all know about them. It has been a good while since I have been in court very much. I notice that the lawyers of the committee in the main have expressed no opinion as to the degree of intelligence or lack of intelligence required on the part of bailiffs and criers. In other words, the gentlemen whose business it is to be in court seem to hesitate, while my distinguished friend from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN], who I believe is not a lawyer—I am willing to stand corrected if he is—seems to know more about the criers and bailiffs of these courts than all the rest of us put together. I do not know whether the gentleman has been a student of bailiffs and criers. I have had my attention attracted to the matter by the fact that we have passed several private bills through this House in behalf of bailiffs under certain conditions. I think the salary of bailiffs was increased, as suggested by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS], some time ago, from $2 to $3 a day. I think there is some prohibition in the statute against a bailiff or a crier serving in any other capacity. We provide here $3 a day for the time of actual attendance. We have been trying to provide salaries in place of the fee system.

If bailiffs were paid by the year in those courts where the courts require the same person as a bailiff, it would be quite fair to fix a daily compensation, but where the bailiff is the bailiff or crier for the court in one of the places where the court may sit once or twice a year for two or three days at a time, of course you should not pay a yearly salary to the bailiff. But here we come to the great cities, where the courts are in session most of the time, though all of them, I think, take an adjournment in the summer time for vacation. These bailiffs can not drop off and go into some other business during that time. If the court is not in session for a day, they can not find something else to do. We ought to pay a reasonable salary if we are paying by the day. Four dollars a day for a man who is not employed all the time is no longer considered an exorbitant salary.

I was over in the Supreme Court the other day, as I drop in once in a while, and I heard the crier announce the opening of the court. It just crossed my mind whether there was anybody in the House of Representatives with a sufficient degree of knowledge, intelligence, ability, and gall to make the announcement which the crier does over there. I know of only one who has the latter qualification, and he is the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN].

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, the Member from Illinois [Mr. MANN] always illuminates any subject that he talks about, but if he had picked up the statutes of his country and quoted one line showing what the duties of bailiffs and criers are it would have helped us more than all the sarcasm and sharp-tongued wit that he has used—just the plain, common, ordinary language as it is written in the books; but there is not a word there for him to quote from, and no one knows it better than does the gentleman from Illinois. It is ethical with a member of the legal profession to retort after the manner of the gentleman from Illinois. There is no other answer to any position that a layman may take except sarcasm, sharpness of the tongue. They do it in the petty courts and they do it on the floors of Congress; they do it wherever they are. It can not be helped. Mr. Chairman, it is bred in the bone.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I understand that section 95 is the one under consideration, it having been read?

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Section 95 is the one that purports to prescribe the witness fees. It provides, among other things, that for each day's attendance in court or before any officer, pursuant to law, a fee of $1.50 shall be paid, and also 5 cents a mile for going from the place of residence of the witness to the place of trial or hearing and 5 cents a mile returning. That is the general rule, $1.50 a day and a mileage of 5 cents. Then, following that, there is a proviso that in the States of Wyoming, Montana, Washington, and others named, the fee shall be $3 a day and the mileage 15 cents per mile. I desire to ask the gentleman from Louisiana if he does not think it appropriate that that proviso be stricken out? That was, no doubt, placed in the law at a time when conditions of travel in those States were quite different from what they were in other States.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, in answering the gentleman's question I will state that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws in preparing this bill was of the opinion that in all probability these extra compensations allowed for mileage and per diem to the witnesses in those particular States might be at this particular time excessive. There is a considerable scope of country where the parties can not reach their destination, the courthouse, wholly by rail. When that law was passed in 1892 the opportunities of reaching the courthouses in those sections of the country were limited, and the Congress at that time thought it was proper to allow that extra compensation—liberal compensation, in other words, as to per diem. I am not prepared to say at this time, with the very limited knowledge I have of the facilities of transportation, what are the opportunities of getting to and from a courthouse, and whether the amount allowed is excessive, whether it should be reduced or placed on the same level as the others; but with the limited knowledge I have of the facilities now of travel everywhere I would not oppose striking out the proviso, if the gentleman makes a motion to that effect.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I am just about to make that motion I move to strike out the proviso on page 60, from lines 12 to 21.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 60, line 12: Strike out the proviso beginning on line 12, down to and including the words "courts," in line 21, as follows:

"Provided, That witnesses in the United States courts in the States of Wyoming, Montana, Washington, Oregon, California, Nevada, Idaho, Colorado, Utah, New Mexico, and Arizona shall be entitled to and receive $3 per day for actual attendance at any court and for the time necessarily occupied in going to and returning from the same, and 15 cents for each mile necessarily traveled over any stage line or by private conveyance, and 5 cents for each mile over any railway in going to and returning from said courts.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, at a time when these various States were not populated with an intelligent, opulent, and pulchritudinous people it might have been appropriate to provide that the witnesses should have double fees, but no one can suggest that Wyoming is any longer a wilderness, that travel in the confines of that State is dangerous. That surely could not be for a moment asserted.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Was Wyoming ever better represented in this House than it is now?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly it never was and it is very doubtful if it ever could be.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman think the present Representative, whom everybody regards so highly, was responsible for this enactment?

Mr. WILLIS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MONDELL. He was.

Mr. WILLIS. This was enacted under the wise leadership of the gentleman from Wyoming, who is always alertly looking after the interests of his constituents.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman may have an extension of five minutes.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire five minutes more in order to explain this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE. Does not the gentleman from Ohio think the people of Wyoming would display very great wisdom if they should continue their present Representative in Congress as long as he desires to remain?

Mr. WILLIS. Undoubtedly they would act with great wisdom in so doing, but I certainly would not like to go into that, because I am informed that the people of Wyoming have, wisely and properly, a still higher office in store for him. Now, on this question of witness fees——

Mr. MANN. There is no higher office.

Mr. WILLIS. Speaking seriously for a moment——

Mr. PAYNE. What might that be?

Mr. MADDEN. What has that got to do with this question of fees?

Mr. WILLIS. Here, for example, in the State of California it is provided by the bill that witnesses shall receive $3 per day for attendance and mileage at 15 cents per mile, while in other States the fee is fixed at $1.50. I understand there may have been a time when there was reason for these excessive charges, but I do not believe that there is any existing now. I think this proviso ought to be stricken out, or if it is to be allowed to stand there ought to be some other places included. If this is to be regarded as a statement of the desert, dangerous, practically uninhabited regions of the country, there ought to be some other places included.

Mr. PAYNE. Ohio, for instance?

Mr. WILLIS. It ought to include at least a portion of the State of Texas; I do not see the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] here, but it ought to include a portion of his State, because I have no doubt that in western Texas the conditions of travel are just as difficult as they are in some of the States mentioned. I do not believe for a moment that there is any reason why this proviso should remain on the statute books. There are other places in the country where travel is just as difficult as it is in California, or Oregon, or Washington, or Colorado, or New Mexico, or any of these States. In other words, I think that the witness fees and mileage for witnesses ought to be put on the same basis all over the country, and I therefore hope my amendment will be adopted and that this proviso will be stricken out.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. In the first place, does not the gentleman think witnesses now ought to be paid more than $1.50?

Mr. WILLIS. I should not be surprised if that were true. I rather think they probably should be paid more; but whatever they are paid they should be paid the same in the various States of the Union, but I doubt whether they ought to be paid as much as $3 per day.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Ohio happen to recall, I do not at this moment, there was a provision of law giving double compensation to officials in those States? Some provisions, I think, have been changed, or a proposition has been made to change them.

Mr. WILLIS. I do not now recall those provisions.

Mr. MANN. I am not sure but what the clerks were that way.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. I do.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. There are some changes in regard to compensation of clerks, I am sure.

Mr. MANN. I think clerks out there were paid double compensation. The gentleman from Ohio, I take it, would not desire to strike out of the bill the provision allowing 15 cents per mile travel where the travel has to be by stage instead of 5 cents where it is by rail?

Mr. WILLIS. I think it ought to be the same in all the States. There are other places in the United States, a great many of them, where it is necessary for witnesses to travel by stage, but as this law stands here these States mentioned are the only places where witnesses would get additional mileage for stage travel.

Mr. MANN. There probably are no other places in the United States outside of those States where the Federal courts are such wide distances apart where the people would be required to travel by other than rail to reach the courts.

Mr. WILLIS. Probably that would be true; I rather suspect it would.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. If I have any more time.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I just want to suggest to the gentleman that even since the tariff has been revised it is impossible for any man to live for $1.50 a day in my section of the country.

Mr. WILLIS. I was not saying anything about that; I was talking about the $3 proposition.

Mr. MANN. Did the gentleman notice in this morning's paper that the price of meat and various other things have gone up in the last week——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I noticed it.

Mr. MANN. And since we have permitted meat to come in free from Argentina the people have to pay a higher price for poor meat than they did in Republican days for good meat?

Mr. MONDELL. And we are paying more for the Army ration, I will remind the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIS. And buying some of it from foreign countries, and buying even the bunting for our flags from foreign countries.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, in his closing remarks the gentleman from Ohio said, "Now, speaking seriously."

Mr. WILLIS. I had been complimenting the gentleman's State before that time. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. And the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. Prior to the time the gentleman complimented my State and myself it is practically admitted the gentleman was not speaking seriously. I am glad to take seriously the compliment he paid me and my State, but it can not be possible that a man on this side of the House would propose seriously a reduction in a reasonable compensation for a public service, and therefore the part of the gentleman's statement that there should be a reduction of witnesses' per diem I do not take seriously.

I am not at all surprised that the gentleman in charge of the bill, whose duty it is to preserve and protect it, because it is not a piece of new legislation but a codification, jumps at the chance to reduce wages. And, while it is his duty in charge of the bill to defend it against any change, immediately there is a suggestion of reducing by half the pay of an American citizen for performing a public service he says, "Why, certainly; we accept it; we are glad to make it. It is really in the line with Democratic policy. Reduce incomes and salaries wherever you can, no matter what they may be at this time."

But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] was not speaking seriously when he advocated the reduction of the $3 a day pay in certain States to $1.50. I think what the gentleman from Ohio desired to emphasize was the fact that the dollar-and-a-half rate in other States was too low—altogether too low. No citizen called from his employment or his business to serve as a witness ought to be compelled to do it at so great a sacrifice as to serve for $1.50 a day. I grant you that in these Democratic times there are, no doubt, people who would be glad to get $1.50 a day, but we do not expect these Democratic times to continue for any considerable length of time. And in view of that fact—that on this side of the House we believe in fair compensation—I trust there will be an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] increasing the compensation in other States for witnesses from $1.50 to $3, the same amount now received in the States mentioned.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman does not want the proviso in there if it is to be all the same. The gentleman intends to vote for my amendment, I take it.

Mr. MONDELL. I know that it will be necessary to vote down the gentleman's amendment in order to offer the amendment which I have in mind. And that is, I hope, what the committee will do, and that is what the chairman of the committee ought to insist on having done.

Let me suggest to the chairman of the committee that if less than a baker's dozen on that side of the House are to pass upon this codification, and with but little larger membership on this side, with the chairman agreeing to any kind of an amendment that may be offered, some one is likely to suggest that it would be well not to continue this farce without having a quorum present while the farce is going on.

Mr. WATKINS. As for a quorum being here during the consideration of this bill, I have never yet raised any objection. I have always wanted everything to be considered by as many Members of the House as we could get together for the purpose of considering the propositions involved in the bill, and I think that a full House and a careful consideration would demonstrate the fact that when we have finished the bill it is a desirable piece of legislation. I admit now, as I have before, that there are features of the bill which deserve to be amended, and we have been operating all the way through in the consideration of this bill with a view of getting the bill in the most satisfactory shape possible at its termination. I hope that the Members will bear in mind that we have no feeling of opposition toward any deserving amendment. This amendment which is offered at this time by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] simply has for its object the putting of all the witnesses on the same level in all the States of the Union, and I can see no possible objection that there could be to it at this time, with the facilities of travel which the gentleman says he is informed the have in those sections, about which I was not entirely informed until this discussion had arisen, and I hear no criticism or objection or refutation of the statements made by the gentleman that we have the same facilities of travel in those sections of the country that made them exceptions to other sections of the country, and with that view in mind I see no reason at all why the citizens in that section of the country should not be placed on the same level as the citizens in other parts of the United States.

As to the proposition of giving adequate compensation to witnesses who are summoned in cases, I will make this answer: This question of payment of witnesses operates whether a man is a millionaire and is doing millions of dollars worth of business a year, whether he is on a compensation of so many dollars a day, or whether he is a poor man and not able to earn more than a dollar or a dollar and a half a day. It is not intended by this provision of $1.50 or $3 a day to pay adequate compensation or to pay the amount which a man could earn in other avocations, but is simply for the purpose of paying him that remuneration which will probably compensate him in a meager way for his attendance upon his duties which he is called upon to perform as a patriotic citizen accorded the rights and privileges of citizenship, and it is compensate him in a meager manner and help bear the expenses of his attendance at court.

I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] is a good amendment and it should be adopted. And if the membership of the House later on should desire to increase the compensation of other witnesses, then will be the time after this amendment is passed upon. But this is simply and purely for the purpose of putting them on the same level throughout the whole country.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman from Louisiana yield for a question?

Mr. WATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. I was going to ask the chairman of the committee if this compensation of $1.50 a day was not practically the same as it has been for the last quarter of a century?

Mr. WATKINS. I do not think there has been a change in the law for many years.

Mr. TOWNER. I do not think there has been a change for a number of years. Does not the gentleman think it would be exceedingly unwise for us to keep it at $1.50 a day?

Mr. WATKINS. If it was intended to remunerate the parties for services rendered, we might say to a gentleman receiving $20 a day that he ought to have the same per diem which he is already drawing by following his avocation. We could put it on that basis. We could say that because he is receiving a certain amount in the avocation he is following that should be the remuneration he should receive as a witness. I think that it should remain as it is. The proposition now is whether we shall put all the States on an equal footing or whether we shall continue the discrimination in favor of those States in which there were such poor facilities for passage to and from the courthouse at the time the law was passed, in 1892, and when this provision was incorporated in the statute.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, and the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is recognized.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the gentleman from Louisiana allowed one more minute if the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] will permit.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TOWNER. I wanted to suggest to the chairman of the committee if he does not think, and is not the idea of the committee that it does not conduce to a satisfactory or a proper administration of justice, that any witness who is called to testify in the United States courts ought to be adequately paid? Is it not an impairment of the efficiency of the courts and does it not impair the administration of justice when they are inadequately paid? Do not witnesses try to escape service from the fact that they can not attend as a witness in the United States courts without a sacrifice to themselves?

Mr. WATKINS. As regards a witness serving, if he is a patriot he has love of country and a regard for the laws of the country in his heart, and he should be willing to serve without being paid that remuneration which he would expect to receive in any employment in which he is engaged.

It is my idea that the very lowest possible amount that will afford anything like adequate compensation for the expense which he incurs in becoming a witness is the amount that should be fixed as the witness fee. Bear in mind that a witness does not spend a whole day, as a rule, in attendance on the court. The courts usually have certain times fixed for certain cases, and the witnesses know the time to be there, and they come and go when they have finished their testimony.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] will not prevail. The gentleman has no conception of the conditions in the Western States. We have hundreds of miles of railroads there, but there are many sections of California and the far West that are far remote from the railroad lines, and one must travel on stages if one is to travel at all. There are sections in California where, in order to go to a Federal court in California, you must travel into Nevada and then come back into California by reason of the impossibility of crossing the high Sierras.

Mr. Chairman, this matter of mileage and compensation for witnesses has been up before the House heretofore by way of special bills on a number of occasions.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Why should witnesses in Los Angeles and San Francisco and those large cities get $3 a day, while a man in New York or in Atlanta gets only $1.50 a day?

Mr. KAHN. Well, Mr. Chairman, it is a very difficult thing to regulate questions of that kind. Some men in official positions are paid salaries of $5,000 or $6,000 per annum. There are a great many men who occupy positions of that kind who come from small communities who could get along on $2,000, and to whom a salary of $6,000 is a small-sized fortune. But the law treats them all alike, and gives them all $6,000. It is the same in the matter of this mileage. All the witnesses are treated alike, because it is difficult to equalize matters of that kind.

If anyone were to travel through the mountainous regions of California or Oregon or Washington or Wyoming, he would realize that it is absolutely impossible to travel for 5 cents a mile. The stages charge considerably more than that; there is frequently a very long stage ride before you get to the railroad station, and the cost for railroad transportation is more there than it is here in the East.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. KAHN. I do.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Can the gentleman inform us how much his State pays witnesses for attendance on court?

Mr. KAHN. I believe it pays them as much as this. I am not quite sure of it, but I am satisfied they pay as much as this.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not $2 a day?

Mr. KAHN. I think we pay $3 a day.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is $2 a day in our State.

Mr. KAHN. I think we pay $3. Some years ago I heard a Member of the House from the gentleman's State say that we ought to pay the Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States no more than $3,000 a year. That would not bind me on the subject, however.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What has that to do with this case? Can the gentleman inform us?

Mr. KAHN. I made that remark because the gentleman says that because they pay $2 in his State they should not pay more in mine. They generally pay higher salaries and higher wages in California than they do in Texas. The minimum wage on public works in California is $3 per day.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is not every Federal court in your State located upon some railroad or in some considerable town?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; but the witnesses are not all located on a railroad or in some considerable town.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is not the gentleman aware of the fact our State is much larger than his?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; but it has not the mountain ranges that we have.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman has never seen the El Paso country, has he?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; I have been in El Paso, and have passed through that country time and time again.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Can the gentleman tell us any reason, save the one that the State of Texas has always been Democratic, why we were not put in this at first?

Mr. KAHN. I do not know; but if the industrious gentleman from Texas had been a Member from Texas at that time, I have no doubt Texas would have been included. But because Texas was not included is no reason why California and Oregon and Nevada and Washington should be cut out.

There have been a number of bills introduced in this House to pay witnesses in certain cases increased traveling allowances and increased per diem. I have in mind the land-fraud cases that were tried here in the city of Washington a few years ago. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] says that a man, as a matter of patriotism, ought to be willing to serve as a witness for $1.50 a day. I think a man who can afford to serve for $1.50 a day ought to serve, and, if need be, he ought to serve for nothing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for another five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. Take the case of a man who has a family to support, say, with four or five children. He is taken away from his work and can not earn a dollar while he is away. Is it fair that he should be cut off with $1.50, and is he to be charged with a lack of patriotism because he receives $3 a day?

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. KAHN. I yield.

Mr. WILLIS. But why should the gentleman's argument in behalf of this poor man with a family apply to the citizen of California and not to the citizen of Texas or Kansas?

Mr. KAHN. Well, the citizen of Kansas—has the gentleman ever been in Kansas?

Mr. WILLIS. It makes no difference. Let the gentleman answer my question.

Mr. KAHN. Has the gentleman ever been in Kansas?

Mr. WILLIS. I have.

Mr. KAHN. Has the gentleman ever been in California?

Mr. WILLIS. I regret I have not.

Mr. KAHN. Well, then, the gentleman has much to see and much to learn.

Mr. WILLIS. I admit that.

Mr. KAHN. Let me tell the gentleman that the entire State of Ohio could be lost in one of the congressional districts of California. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. That does not answer my question—why a poor man in California, with four or five children, should have $3 a day and the man in Texas or Kansas should have only $1.50 a day.

Mr. KAHN. The man that this applies to in California is frequently a man who lives remote from the court.

Mr. WILLIS. Why?

Mr. KAHN. It was evidently intended to affect his case.

Mr. WILLIS. It affects all of them.

Mr. KAHN. As I said to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] awhile ago, it is a difficult thing to regulate every case. Some men in the State of Ohio could go to the Federal courts on 2 cents a mile, and they would not be out of pocket a cent, because your eastern railroads do not generally charge more than 2 cents a mile. Our railroads charge considerably more than 2 cents a mile in the far West.

Much of the travel in the Western States still is done in stage coaches, and the charge is not alone 15 cents a mile, but sometimes much more than that, depending on the locality and where the stage line runs. This matter is a difficult one to equalize. There is a bill pending before this House now, approved by the Attorney General of the United States, recommended by him, to pay additional compensation and traveling expenses for a large number of witnesses that were brought from California a few months ago to appear in the city of New York. The inadequacy of the compensation was so apparent to the Department of Justice that its officials sent a letter recommending that these witnesses be properly paid so that they might not be out of pocket.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. COX. Under the law now if a witness makes oath that he is a poor person and unable to pay, the Government pays it.

Mr. KAHN. I think the Government pays the traveling expenses and he does not have to make any oath.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think the gentleman from Indiana has in mind the statute in the criminal cases where if he is too poor to pay the Government makes the payment.

Mr. KAHN. I imagine that that is the section to which the gentleman from Indiana refers. There should be no injustice done to these people who, having been subpœnaed, must go to court as witnesses whether they find it convenient to do so or not, and who, unless proper compensation is given them, will be money out of pocket. There may be, and probably are, some cases where men receive more than would pay their proper costs; but there are also many cases where, if the amount were cut down, the witnesses who could least afford it would be the ones who would be out of pocket.

Mr. CALDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CALDER. Does not the gentleman believe that the witness in the city of New York, where living is so high, ought to have $3 a day?

Mr. KAHN. I do; and I shall be pleased to vote for an amendment to increase their fees; and I hope the gentleman from New York will find it but right and fair to vote against this amendment to reduce the mileage and per diem in the West.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman must bear in mind that the witnesses referred to in this section are not only the witnesses which the Government has to pay, but which any party to a suit in a civil case has to pay. So that in fixing the fees of a witness in attendance on the court you do not fix it merely for criminal cases, but for what everybody has to pay for in civil cases.

Mr. KAHN. I recognize that fact; but I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the Government has recognized the inadequacy of the present compensation and has recommended to the House that Congress pay additional compensation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the proposition pending before the committee is whether in the States of Wyoming, Montana, Washington, Oregon, California, Nevada, Idaho, Colorado, Utah, and New Mexico we shall reduce the witness fees from $3 a day to $1.50 a day, and mileage where the travel is by stage from 15 cents a mile to 5 cents a mile. I notice that in this body, which has a two-thirds Democratic majority, there is represented upon the floor now the State of Wyoming with a Republican Member of the House. I look in vain for any of the Democratic Representatives from Montana looking after the interests of their State. I notice that the State of Washington has a Member on the floor, but I look in vain for the distinguished gentleman from Washington, Mr. FALCONER, to look after his State.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. No; I do not yield. The gentleman only wants to get his name in the RECORD, and I will say that he is present. He has now put on his hat and gone out. [Laughter.] I notice that the gentleman from Oregon, Mr. LAFFERTY, is not here. I notice the distinguished gentleman from California, Mr. RAKER, who is usually present on all occasions, is at this time caught napping. I am glad to see my distinguished friend from Colorado, Mr. SELDOMRIDGE, has recently come in, and I will tell him what the question is so that he can protect his State, but I do not see anybody from New Mexico. Now, the gentleman from Texas a moment ago suggested that Texas was left out of this legislation because it was a Democratic State.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. No.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Can the gentleman give any other reason except that?

Mr. MANN. No; because I am going to demolish that. The legislation as to mileage was enacted in 1892 by a Democratic House of Representatives. Even the Democratic House would not discriminate against a Democratic State unless it happened to be represented by the gentleman himself from Texas.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as far as I am concerned, I would much prefer to increase the witness fees in other States from $1.50 to $3, than to decrease the witness fees in these States from $3 to $1.50. The truth is, as we all know, that the value of money in making purchases is not as great as it was when the pay of jurors and witness fees were fixed years ago. A man summoned to go into court is required to go. He has no volition in regard to it. We, who had volition, increased our salaries since we have increased the salaries of witnesses. We do not have to come, but the law takes the man with its strong arm and brings him into court. A dollar and a half a day will not pay his subsistence anywhere. If we order one of our officials in the Washington Post Office Department out on the road, we pay him $3 a day for subsistence, and in other departments, in the main, we pay $4 a day for subsistence. And yet it is proposed here not even to allow subsistence to the extent of $3 a day to witnesses dragged out of their home, away from their business, and required to go into court against their will.

Mr. SCOTT. Does not the gentleman from Illinois know that the cost of living has recently been reduced?

Mr. MANN. I will say this, that I am paying the same board bills myself that I did some time ago, and that recently, when we were considering going to housekeeping again, we concluded that the cost of living now for keeping house would be considerably more than it was two years ago. I read in the morning paper how the price of things is soaring, and the Army appropriation in the deficiency bill just coming before the House will show how that is the case all over the country. Oh, Democratic economy and Democratic simplicity caught the country once, but not again—not again.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] mind stating whether he is about to leave the Chamber? [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, since the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] has come into the Chamber just now for the first time, not having been here before during the discussion of this bill, I feel that the liberties of the country will be properly protected if I can get him to stay here, and I am now going to the ball game. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman is correct, except in his statement that previously in the discussion of this bill I was not here. I was here less than two hours ago, and have not been absent to amount to anything at any time when this bill has been considered on prior days.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I want to discuss just for a moment the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS]. I have heard several statements here that it costs a good deal more than a dollar and a half a day in many other parts of the country besides the places named in the bill. That is true, and I think that the fee ought to be increased. I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDER] that it costs more than that to enable a witness to live in the city of New York, and I trust that those who find that in other parts of the country it costs more than a dollar and a half a day will not for that reason be inclined to allow us any more. I do know as a matter of experience that it costs more to live on the Pacific coast than in any other portion of the country, with the possible exception of New York City, and I know that no witness can live in Seattle or Tacoma on a dollar and a half a day. I call the attention of the House to the fact that during one of the noted trials in Alaska it was found that a good many of the witnesses who had been summoned were poor, without means, and one of the parties advanced money in order that those witnesses might live. For that action the parties have been criticized and denounced for so doing ever since. That is the situation you are going to meet in my portion of the country. You compel some poor man to attend court and stay there, and he does not have a sufficient amount on which to live. That is not justice to the man, nor does it tend to promote justice in our courts, and when it comes to talking about Kansas and Ohio and these other States in respect to travel, there is no comparison, and if my distinguished friend from Ohio would go out to the Pacific coast as I wish he may some time soon, he would discover the difference between travel through Kansas and Ohio and through the mountains of the Pacific coast.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. WILLIS. But why, if this proviso stays in the law, should a man receive 15 cents per mile for stage travel in Oregon or California and only 5 cents in Ohio or Indiana or any other State wherein they have occasion so to travel?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Then the amendment the gentleman should offer should be that wherever they travel by stage they should be paid 15 cents a mile, and not to take from the man who now receives only what he should receive.

Mr. KAHN. And is it not more likely that the cost of travel on stages in Ohio is infinitely less than the cost of travel on stages in the West?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is a strong probability, because I know they have no mountains in Ohio to travel over, and I doubt if there is a stage coach in the State of Indiana.

Mr. WILLIS. Oh, that is the method of travel in Indiana.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. But even where they do travel by stage coach, the rate of fare is not as high as it is in the West; but, in any event, I hope the gentleman will change his amendment and do justice to everybody instead of taking the position that because those people in other States are unjustly treated therefore those on the Pacific coast should also be unjustly treated.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I was about to say when interrupted by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] in charge of the bill, that we all realize that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] did not intend to press his amendment. He offered it, I assume, simply to point out the inadequacy of witness fees in States other than those mentioned in the proviso, and of course at the proper time he will withdraw his amendment and vote with us to increase the pay of witnesses elsewhere. I believe that the pay of witnesses ought to be increased all over the country. I think it is not fair to ask men to leave their business, their occupation, their employment, to serve the public at the ridiculous rate of $1.50 a day. Taking a man away from his business and his employment is a great enough loss, even though he should be paid a reasonable sum.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I can not yield; I am sorry. I have only five minutes. Of course, there have been reasons for the higher rate in the mountain country and in the West than in the East. To a certain extent those reasons still exist. It is true that Wyoming is no longer savage, as was suggested by the gentleman from Ohio. In fact, it never was. It is, however, a mountain State, with comparatively few railroads, considering its vast area. Our people travel very largely by private conveyance or stages, and it costs about 15 cents a mile for that kind of travel. Furthermore, the average daily rate of pay is higher in those mountain and Western States than it is generally in the East and in the Mississippi Valley. It is for these reasons that the rate was made higher in those States. This is also true in the West and in the thinly settled regions; in fact, that applies to all agricultural States as compared with the larger Eastern States. In cities like New York or Chicago and elsewhere the witness in the United States courts is not ordinarily required to leave home. He is at or near home, and he is not at as great expense as a witness in one of the Western States, who generally travels great distances to attend the sessions of court, and has to travel and be at a very considerable expense. There are still very excellent reasons for a higher rate in these Western States than in the Eastern States, though these reasons are not so compelling that they should be argued against an increase of the rate in the Eastern States. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] does not want, I hope, to reduce the fair compensation now paid in these Western States. What he really meant and really intended to do, and he has done that very effectively, is to call attention to the fact that the fees are totally inadequate and ought to be increased. At the proper time, when he withdraws his amendment, I hope he will offer an amendment to increase the rate elsewhere. If he does not, it is my intention to so do if the opportunity offers.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to emphasize one proposition that I think ought to be in the minds of the committee in determining the question with regard to raising the amount allowed to witnesses. You have heard this afternoon an instance cited in which the Department of Justice came here asking for money to cover the expenses of witnesses actually in attendance in certain cases. That, gentlemen, is a serious handicap to the Department of Justice in the prosecution of cases. Gentlemen will understand that it is necessary in the prosecution of some of these cases, especially in the prosecution of fraud cases, to call witnesses clear across the country from remote States. An inadequate compensation makes it very difficult for the Government to procure the attendance of witnesses that they really need. Witnesses can very easily avoid subpœnas if they desire to do so. It is not at all difficult, and it is not at all an unusual occurrence that witnesses escape service of the process—have evaded the subpœna, and this really impedes the administration of justice. The very fact that under the present schedule they can not get enough even to pay the ordinary expenses in attendance on court, much less anything in the nature of compensation, has come to be really an impediment and obstruction to the Department of Justice in the prosecution of cases for offenses against the Government.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CULLOP. If you increase the cost per diem to witnesses and the mileage, would not you put a hindrance on litigation? You would put the cost of litigation so high that people with meritorious claims would be unable to go into court for a settlement of them, because, if they lost the case, the cost falling upon them would be so heavy that they would not undertake the litigation in many instances where they had meritorious claims.

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, I will say to the gentleman that the fees paid in the United States courts are less than those allowed in most of the States in the Union; and I will say further to the gentleman, who I know has had experience in trying cases in United States courts, that it is not the witness fees that are the principal items of cost in United States courts, as the gentleman well knows. It is the compensation allowed for things that really do not inhere in the trial that ought to be cut off or at least lessened. It is not those fees, the necessary fees that ought to be allowed for witnesses and for jurors that ought to be cut down. The Attorney General would be very glad, indeed, if he were trying a case in the United States court that his witnesses might know at least they would receive enough to pay them for their expenses in attendance on court.

Another thing it leads to. It leads to the parties litigant paying the witnesses themselves to come, and that, as every gentleman knows, really leads to an impairment, to say the least, of the administration of justice. Parties having cases in court ought not to pay their witnesses for coming under any circumstances, and that is a very common practice, because the fees allowed now are so small that they do not cover their expenses. The party litigant who is a wealthy man can afford to make these payments to his witnesses, and this gives him a great advantage over the poor litigant who can not pay them. The first can say to his witnesses, "You shall not suffer any inconvenience because you will be paid whatever your expenses are, and you can make your expenses whatever you desire to make them." However this may be considered, Mr. Chairman, and from whatever standpoint, such practice is not conducive to a proper administration of justice. These men should all of them be paid adequately, not extravagantly, but a fair compensation so that they will not be tempted to avoid process, and so that they can receive enough to pay at least their necessary expenses while in attendance as witnesses in court.

Mr. DONOVAN. I move to strike out the last one or two words.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending; the gentleman can speak to that.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I had supposed that some of the legal brethren here would have given us some information that would lead us to some proper conclusion. By increasing this amount of fee you increase the receipts of the professional witness. You have professional witnesses, Mr. Chairman, in the court who often appear in a number of cases all set for the same day. That is true. Now, on this proposition, I take it, Mr. Chairman, it is whether we shall have a law for one State and not for another; whether we shall have this law for the whole Nation or a law for only one State. Now, that is a ridiculous proposition, to have laws in regard to fees in one State and not the same law in another State. That should not prevail. The witness fees should be the same all over the country. Now, the cost to litigants in this country at the present time is a great sum of money and the cost of cases is increasing from year to year; and the cost for witnesses, notwithstanding the law written on your statute books at the present time, runs into hundreds of thousands of dollars in some cases, and amongst the professional witnesses, if they can get their names on 15 or 20 subpœnas and you increase the fee from $1.50 to $3, you are increasing their fees in that proportion.

Mr. KAHN. I will ask the gentleman if they have professional witnesses in Connecticut?

Mr. DONOVAN. They have professional witnesses in California, and some of them are in the prison there. They send them to San Quentin, or whatever you call it, and I suppose the most notorious cases in this country were from the gentleman's own city. One of them went by the Sunday name of Ikeuf. He was the most industrious character that has been known in this country for filching money from the treasury for his own purposes.

Mr. KAHN. As a professional witness?

Mr. DONOVAN. Sometimes he got it without earning it.

As to a professional witness, a United States officer will do this in addition to his own fee, namely, have his name inserted in the subpœna, and he will draw the witness fee as a witness, and he will draw his fee as fixed by the statute as an official. For instance, a collector of internal revenue will appear in a tobacco case where an arrest has been made for mutilating the stamps on a cigar box. He draws his fee as collector of internal revenue and he draws his fee as a witness in the prosecution of that particular case. Now, he may go into a town and may find 20 cases there. He will have 20 fees as a witness, and if the fee is a dollar and a half a day it will be twenty times a dollar and a half a day if you make the per diem to that rate. That is what you are doing to these people. Now, the class of people you have such concern about is in a small percentage, possibly not one out of a hundred appearing in court. The witnesses you have to provide for——

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. DONOVAN. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman does not mean to say that he knows of any case where any officer of the United States has collected a witness fee for himself in the case?

Mr. DONOVAN. I know of a collector of internal revenue who has a fixed salary of $3,500 a year, and yet his name has appeared in a subpœna at least twenty times, and he drew the fee, and it was passed upon before the commissioner as an item of cost.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman ought to report that to the prosecuting attorney.

Mr. DONOVAN. If you reported such cases to the prosecuting attorney, you would have them all there.

Mr. KAHN. That gentleman was an internal-revenue collector?

Mr. DONOVAN. He was a United States official.

Mr. KAHN. Was he in Connecticut?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio by the following substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] offers a substitute to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. RUBEY). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is to strike out a certain part, and the gentleman from Iowa can not amend that. He can amend the paragraph before the motion to strike out is put.

Mr. GOOD. I think the gentleman will see that the amendment is in order. I desire to offer an amendment, as follows: Strike out all of line 9, after the word "law" down to and including the word "receive," in line 15, so that the paragraph will read:

For each day's attendance in court or before any officer, pursuant to law, $3 per day for actual attendance at any court and for the time necessarily occupied in going to and returning from the same—

And so forth.

Mr. STAFFORD. May we have the amendment reported, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 60, by striking out all of line 9 after the word "law" down to and including the word "receive," in line 15.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves a point of order. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] is recognized.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to this discussion with considerable interest, and I am convinced that the difficulty lies not in the fact that the witnesses from a few States are receiving more than they ought to receive, but in the fact that the witnesses in a great number of the States do not receive what they should receive. As a matter of fact, in the rural communities throughout the country the witnesses are compelled to go to those places where court is held; in most cases this is far removed from their place of residence. They must pay their board while they are away from home, and the small allowance of $1.50 a day it seems to me is ridiculous.

Mr. BARTLETT. I did not catch the gentleman's amendment. What mileage does he desire?

Mr. GOOD. Five cents a mile except when they travel by stage, in which case it is 15 cents, and which, I think, is not too much.

Mr. BARTLETT. I was trying to catch how the gentleman's amendment read.

Mr. GOOD. It leaves the mileage the same as is provided by law, but it gives witnesses in every Federal court $3 a day, and the gentleman will not say that that is too much. The gentleman will not say that $3 a day is more than our witnesses should receive.

I listened with interest to the remarks of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN]. It is true we find once in a great while professional witnesses, but the great majority of persons who appear in our Federal courts as witnesses are honest men. They ought to have pay enough to pay for a night's lodging and for decent meals when they are away from home, and when you give them $3 a day you do not pay them much, if any, more than their actual expenses when they are away from home attending court. We ought to do this in the interest of justice. Would you not have fairer witnesses, and would there not be less opportunity to tamper with witnesses if we paid them at least their actual expenses when they are away attending court?

Mr. PLATT. It appears that this provides for mileage of 15 cents in case a man travels by stage line and private conveyance and 5 cents a mile if he travels in a railway train. Suppose he goes in a steamboat, does he get any mileage at all? This seems to discriminate against water transportation.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is the same as railroad transportation.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman from Georgia says that is the same as railway transportation, and I suppose it is.

Mr. BARTLETT. He might walk. There would not be any provision about that. Some of them do walk.

Mr. PLATT. If the gentleman had not stricken out the language of line 11, which simply says "5 cents a mile for returning," it would be all right, but what it leaves is 15 cents a mile by stagecoach and 5 cents by railway. There is nothing about any other mode of travel.

Mr. MOORE. Is not that covered in the general application, anyhow?

Mr. GOOD. I think it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I feel constrained to oppose the passage of this substitute in place of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

It is not the idea that witnesses who are summoned into court are to be compensated adequately for the service which they render. In other words, they are not to be paid for the services which they render. It is not to be presumed that the witnesses in testifying are being paid for testifying. They are being paid for that part of the expenses which will barely enable them to perform the service and defray their actual expenses; that is, a witness will not be out entirely the amount of his time and the expense incurred in attending a case in court.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman think that the witness should be out at all on his personal expenses while attending court as a witness—I mean for his board and lodging?

Mr. WATKINS. There are cases, Mr. Chairman, in which it is necessary for witnesses to lose some small amount. The large majority of witnesses who attend court are not like the jurors or others who serve about the court, but in a large majority of cases the witnesses know the hour of the day and the day of the month in which the case is to be tried, and they are summoned there, and they go into court and give their testimony, and go back to their homes in a very short time.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Of course that would not make any difference, if a person were called 25 or 30 miles from his home, whether he went into court at 10 o'clock or at 1 o'clock. Such a person could not attend to his regular duties or regular profession.

Mr. WATKINS. He gets mileage when he goes there.

Mr. GOOD. If he goes away from home, he can not attend to the duties of his calling.

Mr. KAHN. Sometimes in the far West he travels 300 miles and over.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, if this amount is doubled, it will not only encourage persons who have cases in court in many instances to summon witnesses who otherwise would not be summoned, but it will encourage the witnesses themselves who hang around the courthouses to volunteer the information which they claim to have and to flock into the courthouses for the purpose of giving their testimony.

Now, there are a number of cases in which the witnesses receive no compensation at all in a State court. In Louisiana, for example, in criminal cases, when the witnesses are over six in number, they receive no compensation unless they make proper showing, and under the order of the court additional witnesses are ordered to be paid. It is a duty of citizenship to serve as a witness.

Mr. KAHN. The State courts that the gentleman speaks of are generally in the parishes, comparatively near the parties litigant, but Federal courts are frequently held three or four hundred miles away from where the parties and the witnesses live.

Mr. WATKINS. That is a good reason why the compensation should not be so large. It is provided there that the compensation shall be paid during the time they are going to and coming from the courthouse and the place of trial, and provision is also made for the mileage which they receive; and it is going to almost bankrupt the poor people who want to go into court to defend themselves or assert their claims in court.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman rose I had no intention of addressing the House on this question, but there is just one thought that comes to my mind which I think should be brought to the attention of the House, and it is supplementary to the argument made by the chairman of the committee. A few minutes ago I tried to get his approval to an amendment which I offered which sought to cut down the expenses of litigation. That side of the House, with one or two exceptions, outvoted this side. If you put the rate at $3 a day for witness fees, you are going to add to the cost of litigation.

Mr. BARTLETT. You are going to double it.

Mr. STAFFORD. You are going to make it an incentive to litigants to have witnesses remain at the trial of cases, which will cause costs to mount up to such an exorbitant price as to discourage litigation rather than make it as light a burden as should be our aim. It is the policy of the Government always to reduce the cost of litigation to a minimum; and I hope that this amendment, which seeks to place a double burden upon litigants, will be defeated.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on the substitute?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes; I desire to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] is recognized.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to take up much time of the committee, but since a number of gentlemen have undertaken to indicate to the House what my purpose was in introducing this amendment, I am rather inclined to believe that I ought to state what my purpose is. It is this, which is now admitted by everybody in this discussion, to call attention to the injustice of providing one scale of witness fees and mileage for certain States in the Union and an entirely different scale of fees and mileage for other States in the Union.

At the beginning of this discussion it was insisted by various gentlemen that there ought to be a difference, but now that an amendment has been offered, so that those in other States are going to get an increase of 100 per cent, they talk in an altogether different way, and now it is admitted witnesses are entitled to the same amount per day in all the States.

I introduced this amendment not to raise the question as to the adequacy or inadequacy of the present provision but to call attention to an anachronism in the statute which ought not to be there. I am calling attention now to the fact that if you vote for this substitute you have complicated the question and have allowed those who desire to increase the cost of litigation to write into the law such a provision under the guise of securing uniformity. I think these things ought to be settled by themselves. I think the substitute offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] ought to be voted down. Then we would come directly to a vote on the amendment which I offered, which seeks to provide that the proviso, from lines 12 to 21, inclusive, shall be stricken out. Then if you want to take up the question of increasing witness fees you can do so. But let us get these questions settled one at a time. Vote down the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa and then we can have a vote on the amendment which I offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the point of order made by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIS. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were 32 ayes and 8 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an article from the St. Louis Republic showing that we need 20,000 laborers in Oklahoma to do the work that has been created by Democratic prosperity.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the article that the gentleman wants to publish?

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. An article showing that we need 20,000 laborers to do the work in the State of Oklahoma since the Democrats have come into power.

Mr. STAFFORD. I trust that Oklahoma will receive all the surplus unemployed labor in the country.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, let me suggest that Henry Ford, the automobile maker, is about to lay off 7,000 men from his employment, and they might find employment in Oklahoma.

Mr. BARTLETT. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. CALDER. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. BARTLETT. The regular order.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Unless I know what it is, I shall object.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask that the gentleman from Oklahoma be allowed to read the article.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I did not hear what the article was, and I am not going to consent unless I know what it is.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I stated that it was an article showing that we need 20,000 laborers in Oklahoma to do the work brought on by Democratic prosperity.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Up in the Pennsylvania steel mills the gentleman will find 100,000 idle men, and he can take them down there.

Mr. CALDER. We have 30,000 idle men in New York.

Mr. CARTER. Why should not they want to go to a great and good State?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 60, line 9, after the word "law," strike out "$1.50" and insert "$2.50."

Mr. STAFFORD. Why does not the gentleman strike out the word "one" and insert "two"?

Mr. MOORE. Because I want to raise it a dollar.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman strikes out "one" and inserts "two," he raises it a dollar.

Mr. MOORE. Then we would have to strike out the "dollar" and insert "dollars."

Mr. STAFFORD. But you would not have to strike out the "50 cents."

Mr. MOORE. I am not discussing 50 cents; I am trying to get $2.50. Mr. Chairman, throughout the whole discussion of the Willis amendment there appeared to be a disposition to increase the amount paid witnesses who are put to expense to serve the country in the courts. I refrained from discussing the matter until I learned through the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] that apparently the excepted States had been inserted not because the Republicans wanted to keep Texas out, but because the Democrats who framed the law evidently wanted to exclude Pennsylvania. [Laughter.] Until then I did not believe there was any politics in this matter at all.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman know that this was in 1892, when there was a Democratic House but a Republican Senate?

Mr. MOORE. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was correct—and he directed his remarks to the gentleman from Texas—then the provision was inserted by Democratic authority.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. But the gentleman from Illinois refused to yield, and so did the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman from Illinois made a statement and the gentleman from Texas was silent, so far as I observed.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. The date was August 3, 1892.

Mr. MOORE. Why did not the gentleman from Georgia arise when the gentleman from Illinois made the statement?

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, it is not always well to answer all the unauthorized and unsubstantiated statements of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think it is unfair to make that statement when the gentleman from Georgia knows that the gentleman from Illinois is absent.

Mr. MOORE. I am glad the gentleman from Wisconsin has gallantly arisen to resent the cruel aspersion cast upon the gentleman from Illinois who is not now in the House.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman from Illinois would know and the gentleman from Pennsylvania ought to know in what spirit the statement was made. I had not noticed that the gentleman from Illinois was absent. I will except the gentleman from Illinois and let it apply to all those on that side of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE. I was greatly surprised that when our champion was on the floor and made the statement the gentleman from Georgia did not arise in his place and correct the gentleman from Illinois. He lost his day in court.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman from Illinois has gone to the ball game and deserted his post.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman from Illinois was frank enough and daring enough in the presence of a small Democratic minority now undertaking to do business to say that he was going to the ball game. He mentioned it openly, which many of the gentlemen on the other side have not been able to do, although they also are at the ball game. The game is largely attended by the Democratic majority this afternoon. We are doing business without a quorum—a paucity of Democrats undertaking to codify the laws of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTLETT. I object.

Mr. MOORE. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. I object.

Mr. MOORE. I yielded to the gentleman three or four times, and the gentleman from Georgia took two and a half minutes of my time.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not think I took as much time as that, but I withdraw the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, if I spoke as frequently on the floor as the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, I would occasionally make amends to the House. I do not know anyone who so persistently expounds constitutional law as the gentleman from Georgia, and the Lord knows I never undertake a job like that. [Laughter.]

I am not going to laud any further the gentleman from Georgia, because he will speak for himself in due course of time, and amply, too. What I was going to say was that the Democratic Party, represented by a very few of its members this afternoon, can not afford to cut down witness fees. More especially, it can not afford to take a laboring man away from his work in Texas or Louisiana or in California or in Pennsylvania, where he is earning from $2.50 to $6 a day, and put him at the mercy of courts and lawyers in continuing cases where he will receive only $1.50 a day.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. If the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] will not object to an extension of time.

Mr. CARTER. I can not guarantee that.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will not do it. I know the House wants to hear the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE. I am pleased to observe the appreciation in which the House holds anything I have the honor to say to it.

Mr. CARTER. Might it not be possible to get some of those hundreds of thousands of men in the gentleman's district who are out of a job on the jury in the court?

Mr. MOORE. Down in Oklahoma? I do not think they would go down there. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARTER. Oh, they are all at work in Oklahoma, and the only thing that keeps them from being at work in Pennsylvania is that the gentleman himself is not in Oklahoma.

Mr. MOORE. I might be able to tolerate it, but I question whether any of the others could.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, do I understand the gentleman to say that they are receiving six and seven dollars a day?

Mr. MOORE. Yes; a good bricklayer in Philadelphia will make from five to six dollars a day. Suppose a bricklayer to be cognizant of the passing of a counterfeit 5-cent piece, and suppose that he be called into court, does the gentleman think it fair to give him a dollar and a half as a witness while taking him away from his job where he is earning five or six dollars a day? What becomes of the difference between that and the dollar and a half a day.

Mr. CARTER. Are they at work in Pennsylvania? I thought everybody was out of work.

Mr. MOORE. A very large proportion of them are not at work just now. The building trades have suffered along with the industries cut by the tariff.

Mr. CARTER. We might call on them for jury service.

Mr. MOORE. If they had nothing better to do, they might serve on a jury for a dollar and a half a day, but to take them away from their work, as is constantly done in the Federal courts, put them on the witness stand at a dollar and a half a day, is a very unfair proposition to the wives and children who are dependent upon them. It seems to me that the House itself indicated a little while ago, though very few of us were present, that we ought to raise this witness fee above a dollar and a half a day. It gave expression to its opinion in the passage of the Willis amendment that we ought not to differentiate between the States, that we ought not to classify and make favorites of one set of States as against another, but there was no difference of opinion apparently as to the propriety of paying the witness a fair price for the services he rendered his country, as you are pleased to call it. Therefore I ask that the rate generally all over the country be raised from $1.50 a day to $2.50 a day. It seems to me to be a fair proposition, especially in these days when the cost of living is mounting higher and higher and higher day after day, in spite of all the professed economy that was to be effected through this administration, and in spite of the tariff changes that promised so much and fulfilled so little.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MOORE) there were—ayes 20, noes 22.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 60, line 11, after the word "returning," insert "and 15 cents for each mile necessarily traveled over any stage line or by private conveyance."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, there are many places in the United States where the only method of getting to the railroads which would carry one to the city where the court holds its sessions is by way of a stage line or by a private conveyance. The cost of travel over those lines is considerably more than 5 cents a mile. There are many sections of the West in particular where it costs as high as 25 cents a mile to travel over the rough mountainous roads. Gentlemen in speaking on this matter this afternoon have taken exception to the fact that the present law made a special allowance to the Western States with their great expanse of territory, their mountainous character, and the difficulties of travel. You never hear a man from the West object to necessary expenses in other sections of this country. We of the West constantly vote large appropriations to help the people of the South, to help the people of the East, and we do it without question, because we believe that conditions in those sections require those appropriations. We of the West, however, know the conditions of travel in the West. There are two places in California where the Federal courts hold their sessions regularly—San Francisco and Los Angeles. The State of California is 800 miles long. There are sections in the eastern part of the State where a man has to expend almost two days in practically constant travel in going to the place where the court is held. A similar situation prevails in other sections of the West. The witness who is called to attend a trial should not be out of pocket, and litigants should not be out of pocket by reason of the cost of bringing him to the place where the trial is held.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. How many miles do those witnesses have to travel that they take two days to come to the court?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, between three and four hundred miles.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly, in a moment; but I should say to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] that that is not, of course, all in a stage. They have in some cases to travel over into Nevada by stage, and then in Nevada by stage for a considerable distance, until they get to the line of the railroad. Then they travel on the railroad to San Francisco or Los Angeles or Sacramento, as the case may be.

Mr. WINGO. Of course the gentleman did not intend any reflection upon the State of Nevada. Does the gentleman think crossing an imaginary line like a State line adds a burden on a witness so that he should have additional compensation?

Mr. KAHN. I did not intend anything of that kind. I simply wanted to point out to the gentleman that by reason of the high mountains and the rough country through which the stages travel that instead of being able to go right across the mountains they have to follow the canyons and travel by stage into the adjoining State before the witnesses can reach the railroad so as to attend the place of trial of court. I state that as an instance of travel in the West.

Mr. LLOYD. What is the purpose of putting in the words "private conveyance"?

Mr. KAHN. Well, frequently——

Mr. LLOYD. Well, as I understand it, if a man lives 10 miles from a town, and he wants to go there, and he goes in a private conveyance, under the provisions of this amendment he would be entitled to 15 cents a mile each way.

Mr. KAHN. Well, I am not positive on the subject, but I think that has been construed to apply in a case of this kind: Where a man is compelled to go as a witness and be present in court on a certain day, and he lives in a region where the stage may run only three days in the week, he would have to hire a private conveyance in order to get to the place where he could get on board a railroad train or where he could get a stage line that would run regularly.

Mr. LLOYD. I can readily understand some such case might arise, but I think the language ought to be the language that is found in existing law.

Mr. KAHN. I have copied the language of the existing law.

Mr. LLOYD. The existing law has words preceding it which were to the effect that it was the necessary method of travel.

Mr. KAHN. I used the word "necessarily" in the amendment I have proposed.

Mr. LLOYD. I do not so understand it.

Mr. KAHN. I copied the exact language of the provision of the present law in my amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I have just been reading the amendment since this colloquy took place, and the gentleman did not incorporate the language referred to by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. LLOYD. That is what I wanted to call attention to, and I think it ought to be incorporated in the amendment.

Mr. KAHN. What does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. WILLIS. Let the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 60, line 11, after the word "returning," insert "and 15 cents for each mile necessarily traveled over any stage line or by private conveyance."

Mr. KAHN. "Necessarily traveled."

Mr. WILLIS. That is the exact language of the present law.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the gentleman from Missouri directed attention to the preceding clause, "and for the time necessarily occupied in going and returning from the same." That is not incorporated in the amendment.

Mr. KAHN. I do not think that adds anything to the amendment.

Mr. LLOYD. I think what the gentleman is seeking to do has some merit. I am not saying I will support his amendment at all, but there is some merit in the proposition that when a witness has to travel by stage coach in a mountain region that he ought to be entitled to additional compensation; but I do not believe he ought to present an amendment which would authorize an individual to travel by private conveyance and get 15 cents a mile. In these days a man with an automobile may be 40 miles away from a place, and he may go and come in an automobile and get 15 cents a mile.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KAHN. I understand the gentleman's purpose, and I thank him for his kindness, but I think the word "necessarily" in the amendment, "and necessarily traveled over any stage line or by private conveyance——"

Mr. LLOYD. I think the best way would be to leave out the words "or by private conveyance."

Mr. KAHN. I will modify the amendment to that extent. I will ask that the words "or by private conveyance" may be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be so modified.

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. I now yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Does not the gentleman think it would be a matter of economy and a matter of wisdom and convenience to the people of California if other places for holding their courts could be established in that State, in order to prevent bringing these witnesses such long distances?

Mr. KAHN. I want to say to my friend Congress has already passed laws for the holding of courts at other places, but the number of cases that are tried in those other places are very few. They prefer to try all the cases or practically all the cases in San Francisco and Los Angeles. I presume the accommodations are better there and the attorneys prefer to try them there, but even the other places that have been fixed by law for holding terms of court are not so far away from those places. Take Sacramento, for instance. Sacramento is only 91 miles away from San Francisco, and if the witnesses reside in the mountain regions of California, it is as easy to get to San Francisco as to Sacramento because the railroad runs from Sacramento to San Francisco. The same thing is equally true with regard to cases in the southern part of the State. Fresno is on the line of the railroad, and people who live in Inyo County and over in the eastern counties of California would have to travel a great distance by stage in order to get to Fresno.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE and Mr. STAFFORD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman's amendment, I fear, will accomplish a purpose that he does not intend. I assume that the gentleman does not intend to allow a witness, in addition to the 15 cents he receives while traveling by stagecoach, the other allowance of 5 cents a mile, which is incorporated in the paragraph as it now stands. As the gentleman's amendment is proposed, it would be supplementary to the 5-cent allowance, to which all witnesses are entitled.

Mr. CULLOP. And the mileage then would be 20 cents a mile each way.

Mr. STAFFORD. It would be 20 cents a mile, so far as that distance covered by stagecoach is concerned. He would get the 5 cents accorded to all witnesses going and coming, and if he traveled by stage he would get 15 cents additional.

Mr. KAHN. That was the old law in the Western States.

Mr. STAFFORD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. It was not the old law.

Mr. KAHN. It says:

Fifteen cents for each mile necessarily traveled over any stage line or by private conveyance, and 5 cents for each mile over any railway in going to and returning from said courts.

Mr. STAFFORD. What have we before the House to-day? We have here the first paragraph in section 95, which provides for a witness fee of 5 cents a mile for going from his place of residence to the place of trial or hearing, and 5 cents a mile for returning. And then comes your amendment, as to 15 cents a mile necessary to be traveled over any stage line, and it would mean 15 cents additional to that allowed in the first provision. The gentleman does not intend that.

Mr. KAHN. I do not think the amendment does so state. It should be 5 cents a mile for any railroad.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no provision of that kind.

Mr. GOOD. The second proviso absolutely prohibits anything of that kind.

Mr. KAHN. The second proviso, to which the gentleman from Iowa calls attention, prohibits that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 60, line 9, after the word "law," strike out "$1.50" and insert "$2."

Mr. MOORE. Now, Mr. Chairman, a little while ago, by a vote of 22 to 20, an amendment to increase the witness fee from $1.50 to $2.50 was defeated. I observed a number of our friends on the other side of the House voted to increase the fee, and I think they did it out of a conscientious desire to properly repay those who serve in the courts as witnesses. All the votes were not upon the Republican side, although I think all of the Republicans voted "aye," but there were some Democrats who voted "aye." Now, the question is simply this: In these times of an increased cost of living are you going to take workmen or others away from their daily toil, keep them around the court room waiting until cases are called, for $1.50 a day, or are you going to advance it to $2 a day and give them a chance to get something out of their service and in return for the expense to which they are subjected?

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Does not the gentleman realize also that the character of accommodations sometimes offered witnesses in towns where court is held are of very ordinary character at the low price of $1.50 a day? You can hardly secure a room at that price.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman is right. Only within the last two weeks in a neighboring State I observed a man leaving his daily work for the county seat. I asked him where he was going. He said he was going to court. I asked him how long he had been going there, and he replied that he had been going for three or four days, paying his expenses back and forth. Here was a workman, with a small shop, who had to get some one to come in to take care of it and see that the business went on. He was losing trade while he was away. That man probably could make three or four dollars a day out of his employment. He was taken away for the kind of service we here expect him to perform at $1.50 a day. It is not unfair to raise it to $2.50 a day, but I am asking now as a compromise between $1.50 and $2.50 a day that you give him $2 a day. This puts us in a position of at least being fair with these men who have to lay down their work in order to attend to the public business. It is a compromise which I earnestly hope will pass.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I sympathize as much as does the gentleman from Pennsylvania with witnesses being paid less than their expenses. I understand that this bill applies to civil as well as criminal cases in Federal courts. It seems to me the best way would be to give the State courts jurisdiction of cases up to $10,000. Then, trials could be had of civil suits in the neighborhoods where the parties live, the same as suits in State courts. The idea of taking a witness 100 or 200 miles in a civil lawsuit—I mean a civil case in a Federal court—and tax the costs against the unsuccessful party, unless that party is a man of considerable means it seems to me the very fact of having to pay all these witness fees and mileage makes a suit in the Federal court almost prohibitive. I can not see why the learned judges of the great States of New York and Pennsylvania, or any other State in this country, are not learned enough in the law to try all these civil suits regardless of the amounts involved. Originally, in order to remove a suit from a State to a Federal court on account of diverse citizenship the amount involved must be as much as $500, exclusive of costs, and it must be $3,000 before they can get into a Federal court from a State court.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Does not the gentleman know that there are large corporations now within a State that are endeavoring to secure incorporation outside of the boundaries of the State in order to place them under a Federal jurisdiction just for the very purpose the gentleman has named?

Mr. SIMS. The corporations prefer to go to the Federal court and litigate because they are able to go to the Federal court, and the people with whom they litigate usually are not able, and consequently the corporations, by this course, are able to drive hard bargains and compromises. I sympathize with what the gentleman says about these low witness fees, but if he and the rest of this House would go to work and raise the jurisdiction of the State courts to $10,000 before removal is permited it would accomplish the purpose.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman is discussing another matter apart from the amendment. I presume there is something in what the gentleman says. But has the gentleman ever heard of a situation, where a corporation was involved in litigation in a Federal court, with its own employees as witnesses, where they were called out from the service of the corporation and given what was practically a holiday for them, while the defendant or the plaintiff on the other side was a man standing alone, having only his day's wage to rely upon? Could not the poorer litigant thus be held up from day to day at the pleasure of the corporation, or at the pleasure of the corporation's attorneys, until the case went to trial? Can you conceive the very great disadvantage under which a litigant labors who has to contend against a corporation whose witnesses are its own employees?

Mr. SIMS. I can readily conceive it, but I can not see why paying witnesses $2 a day will remedy the situation of which the gentleman complains. If you will increase the jurisdiction of the State courts so that the corporation or its employees may attend trials in their own town, they will not have to board in hotels, nor will it make a suit prohibitive against the poor man contending with a corporation, as it is at present.

Mr. MOORE. But the poor man's case depends upon witnesses who must be paid by somebody, and he can not always pay them; they will not remain. The corporation's witnesses are kept at a first-class hotel and under constant pay. Can not the gentleman see that we ought to give a chance to the poor litigant to hold his witnesses together? The law's delays are constantly postponing the suit at the instance of the other side.

Mr. SIMS. The poor man might lose the suit and have to pay the costs also. Why not let him have his day in court in his own town instead of rushing him off to a Federal court, where he has to go sometimes 200 or 300 miles?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. SIMS. My time has expired, Mr. Chairman, but my speech was made almost entirely by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I fear that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], while he is making provision, as he says, to compensate the poor witnesses, or the poor man, is digging a pitfall for the poor litigant that will keep him out of court altogether.

In the very cases he has mentioned, doubtless nine times out of ten one of the opposing litigants in the case is a poor man. Where is he going to get the money to advance big witness fees and big mileage? In the Federal courts he must advance the fees every day. He must advance the mileage before the witness is subpœnaed and before the marshal will serve the subpœna. He is, by such process, in increasing the witness fees and mileage, shutting the doors against every man who has a right to bring a suit in the Federal courts of this country. Where is he going to get the money to advance $3 a day for witness fees? Where is he going to get the money to advance 15 cents a mile each way for his witnesses to attend court? He must put up the money before the witnesses are subpœnaed. He must give it to the marshal when he hands his subpœnas to him to serve upon his witnesses. And while he is getting a high fee, as is claimed, for the witness who may attend court, he is driving the poor litigant out of court and shutting the door against him. He is making the corporation that he pictures much more powerful by the process now proposed by him than it is at the present time.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. CALDER. Is not the great difficulty with the poor litigant the fact that he has to pay the lawyers in most cases an exorbitant fee rather than the witnesses?

Mr. CULLOP. In many instances he has not the money to pay a stipulated fee, and he must employ his lawyer upon a contingent basis. Then add to it high costs, and what has been done for the poor litigant? However meritorious his case may be, he has not the money to pay to try his case and put his case on record and bring his witnesses to court and have a trial of the case.

Now, Mr. Chairman, while we are discussing this subject, one thing seems to me very clear in this matter, and that is there ought to be terms of Federal courts fixed in certain defined jurisdictions. Take the illustration that the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has presented. Two Federal courts are located in a State 800 miles long. That matter could be remedied by law. You can define the localities where the courts are to sit around over a State, and cases arising in those localities by law ought to be required to be tried in those localities.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. Does not the gentleman recognize the fact that in order to hold court in other localities, or in various localities, you must have the Federal courthouses for them to meet in?

Mr. CULLOP. No. I do not recognize that fact, that you must have Federal courthouses. In every county, doubtless, in your State they have a court building or a Federal building. In every given territory one locality would be fixed for the Federal courts provided by law, naming the counties that should have their cases tried in that locality; and even if there was no post-office building or Federal courtroom there they could for a given period of each year have the use of the local courtroom and try the cases there.

I know the tendency is as the gentleman from California has stated, that your Federal judge lives at the capital or in some big city in a State. There are places designated throughout the State where the Federal court is to be held. They, as a rule, open court and hold it about one day, and then transfer the docket up to the capital of their State or to the city where they live; and then the witnesses and the litigants are put to a great deal of inconvenience and expense to meet the pleasure of the judge.

That practice ought to be broken up. It puts a price upon the administration of justice, and it ought to be stopped by law. Take my own State, for example. The law provides that court shall be held at some five different places in the State. In reality it is only held in one place. Cases arise in other localities where the judge opens court, holds it a day or two, and then the docket is transferred to Indianapolis, and the judge returns, because it is more convenient for him, and the convenience of the litigants is lost sight of. The very convenience that ought to be consulted is entirely ignored and their rights entirely lost sight of. Now, by law such localities ought to have a jurisdiction fixed, and cases arising in such jurisdiction ought to be tried in those localities. There ought to be a provision of law requiring it. This method would reduce expenses of litigants and serve their convenience and aid in the speedy administration of justice. I hope this remedy will be had through appropriate legislation.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman, in suggesting that it was the poor litigant that could not pay a witness fee, of course states the fact, but the general rule is that the poor litigant's friends, with his attorney, will lay their plans for a trial; their witnesses will go and do not expect to get any witness fee unless the litigant prevails in the action.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. I know of no place where that is practiced. The poor witness has no money, and how can you expect to make an arrangement for him to go unless you pay his fees?

Mr. BRYAN. There is no poor litigant who has not friends, and those friends will go with him to court, and when they get there if they win they ought to have a legitimate compensation. Out in our State we have a woman's minimum wage for women workers, and that wage is fixed at $10 a week as a minimum. The municipalities have a minimum wage of $2.50 and $2.75 for men for common labor. Does this Congress think it is right to permit a corporation or a poor litigant to summon a lot of people and give them $1.50 a day, take them away from their home where expenses are multiplied by three or four, and give them a compensation which is less than their regular compensation? I think we ought to consider that feature of it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. When a corporation summons its employees as witnesses to appear in court and testify, is it not a fact that the corporation requires these witnesses to assign to it their witness fees?

Mr. BRYAN. I do not doubt that that is a fact—that they pay the wages and they take the fees. Of course that has nothing to do directly with this proposition as to whether a person can live on $1.50 a day away from home. It is not an adequate compensation and it is not right. We have talked about the confiscation of earnings and the confiscation of property; why should we go and confiscate the amount of a man's wages without any consideration?

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. I believe the gentleman referred to the common practice—and I presume he referred to his own State—for litigants and witnesses to agree to try a lawsuit, and if the plaintiff won they would all get something out of it, but if the plaintiff lost they would all lose.

Mr. BRYAN. I said many times that was the case, that witnesses would go and testify without expecting pay if the litigant failed.

Mr. CARAWAY. Now, the gentleman wants to make the compensation large enough so that they could get together in a conspiracy and speculate in lawsuits.

Mr. BRYAN. If the gentleman from Arkansas got the idea that I want to increase the compensation of witnesses so that they may enter into a conspiracy, I think he drew on his imagination. I maintain that $1.50 a day is not enough to pay hotel bills or the bills at a decent restaurant to enable anybody to keep soul and body together.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this is Calendar Wednesday. This is the day dedicated by the House for the consideration of important measures that under the ordinary rules and procedure of the House could not otherwise be considered. Upon the calendars of the House are a number of very important bills. Some of them are of immediate and pressing importance and urgency. Some of these bills would in the ordinary course of business on Calendar Wednesday be now up for consideration.

One of these is an important bill which proposes to extend the period of payment by settlers on reclamation projects. There are some 27 of these projects in the country. The settlers on these projects are many of them finding it difficult to meet the payments on the present basis and under the present arrangement. The committees having charge of these matters have carefully considered the questions involved and have brought in legislation.

The bill has passed the Senate, been reported by the House committee, is on the calendar, and but for the consideration of this bill would now be before the House. Everyone realizes that this bill now being considered can not become a law this session. What we are doing here is to uselessly consume the time of the House. Gentlemen on the Democratic side have very properly characterized the consideration of this bill as a pussy-footed filibuster of Calendar Wednesday. That is bad enough if that was all there was to it. But that is not all. This is a bill for the revision of the laws under the Judiciary title. It is a codification. In the main it contains no important changes of law. It is intended simply as a codification to arrange in proper form the laws relating to the judiciary and judicial procedure. It is ordinarily understood when a bill of this kind is under consideration that those in charge of the bill will oppose any important amendment in the nature of a change of law. It is their duty to do that. We are considering this measure practically by unanimous consent. There have been times to-day when there was not a score of Members present. There have been times when there was not to exceed seven men in their seats on the Democratic side by actual count. There have been times when there were not many more on this side.

Now, an amendment was offered a short time ago changing the law in an important particular affecting many States of the Union.

Mr. FRANCIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. FRANCIS. The gentleman speaks of there being but a few Members present this afternoon. Has not that been true on every general bill practically brought before the House?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, it is true to a degree that is regrettable oftentimes, but it is very seldom true to the degree that it has been true in the consideration of this measure.

The reason for it is that no one has any notion that what is done here will have any permanent effect. Everyone appreciates, all Members understand, that this is just a procedure for consuming the time of the House on Calendar Wednesday—a buffer, some gentleman has suggested, against needed and necessary legislation.

Mr. FRANCIS. Is that the reason the gentleman is consuming this time—to filibuster against the bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Not at all. I have consumed no considerable time on this bill. I am making this speech to call attention to the situation that exists, discreditable, in my opinion, to the entire membership of the House, and particularly to the gentlemen on the other side, who are responsible for the procedure here.

Mr. FRANCIS. We have understood that ever since the bill has been up; and is there any more important bill before the House than this one to revise the laws relative to the judiciary, and to codify them, which has been a crying need for 20 years?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, there are many bills more important at the present time.

Mr. FRANCIS. What are they?

Mr. MONDELL. I just referred to one. There are a score of them; the workman's compensation act, for instance, is infinitely more important.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Then there is the water-power bill, and the Alaskan coal bill; there are four or five conservation bills, and the calendars are full of important bills. There is the amendment to the Constitution to enfranchise women, and the prohibition amendment—no end of important measures which might be enacted into law; this bill can not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, the lecture that we have just listened to is the kind of lecture that we have been listening to on Calendar Wednesday, in a little different shape, since this bill has been before the House. This bill is here in good faith. No man on the floor of the House—I care not who he is—has given more painstaking attention to the consideration of his bill than has the chairman of this committee. [Applause.] This bill is properly here, and if it had not been for the repeated attempts that have been made by individuals to consume time and prevent the passage of this bill we would now have been nearly through with its consideration.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for an interruption there?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. Have not years of time and a very large sum of money been expended by the party on that side of the aisle to make this revision and codification of the laws, and is there a more important bill than this? Did not the party on the other side of the aisle create a commission and pay that commission tens of thousands of dollars to do this work, which it failed to do?

Mr. LLOYD. What I am impressing upon the House is this: That the man who undertakes now by any kind of speech to criticize this House, to criticize this chairman, or Calendar Wednesday, is standing up in defiance of the rules of the House and undertaking to prevent that which we ought to do, and that is to go ahead with the consideration of this important bill. There is no reason why this bill may not be passed by this House and become a law if the Members of the House will do their duty in trying to secure its passage; but every little amendment that can be offered is discussed from time to time, for hours at a time, and why? Everyone understands that the real purpose is to bring Calendar Wednesday into disrepute and to make this what the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] considers a buffer bill. But this bill is here in good faith. It is here after hard work; it is here after the most painstaking and careful consideration, and everyone who has observed the chairman of this committee in the consideration of this bill knows that he is practically familiar with every item in it and can give the reason for everything that he undertakes to do. [Applause.]

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I have no criticisms to make of my colleagues, and certainly no criticism of the efficient and worthy chairman of this committee [Mr. WATSON]; but the proceeding of this House in connection with this bill, I hope, will make an impression on the membership as to the absolute necessity of an amendment to our rules which will prevent, as far as the future is concerned, the unnecessary consumption of public time in the consideration of one of these long bills, and thus prevent the Members of this House from reaching bills on the Private and other calendars. I had entertained a hope that the gentleman in charge of this measure would find a way by which we could relieve the situation, in appealing to the Committee on Rules, for instance, to set aside a day for the consideration of this bill, to limit debate upon it, and have an end to its consideration and its early passage. I find on examination of the calendar that there are 193 private bills reported favorably, 107 on the House Calendar, and 194 bills on the Union Calendar, making a total of 494 bills. We have consumed, I believe, five Calendar Wednesdays in the consideration of the pending bill. In that time we have passed over 61 of the 198 pages of the bill, leaving 137 pages that have not been considered. At this rate of speed every Calendar Wednesday during the balance of this session, even if we remain here until the 1st of August, will be consumed in the consideration of this bill, perhaps in the end without a final vote, and in the meantime we will have prevented the consideration of any of the 494 bills that have all been considered by the various committees of the House and are upon the calendars with favorable reports. Many of these bills are of a general character, of importance to the people of America, and there is a large number of great importance to individuals affected by them, and if we do not find a means of disposing of these bills during this long session of Congress, when we return here for the winter session, with less than 90 days for the consideration of the appropriation bills, we will be unable to reach any of these bills.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer a suggestion to the gentleman that he cease and let the Clerk commence the reading of the bill and try to suggest to his associates to make no interruptions, to offer no amendments, and in the matter of an hour or two the bill will be read and passed.

Mr. AUSTIN. I did not occupy the floor for the purpose of receiving suggestions, but simply to submit my plain, commonsense view of the legislative situation for the consideration of those in charge of and responsible for the legislation here.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to know whether the gentleman is going to discuss the amendment which is offered allowing witnesses $2 a day. If he is going to discuss that, there is no objection; but if he is going to discuss some political question, it is hardly fair to the majority Members of the House, who have not been making or offering amendments and detaining the House here in discussion for hours at a time, like gentlemen on that side of the House have done, and I will have to object if he is going to resort to tactics like that.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not think the gentleman ought to object. I think we have been pretty considerate on this side of the House. We have not had a quorum here at any time since I have been here, and I have been here all day.

Mr. WATKINS. If the gentleman will proceed in order I have no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman is going to object, I am going to insist on having a quorum present.

Mr. WATKINS. Well, at the end of the five minutes——

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I do not think that the gentleman, after we have spent a good deal of time here, ought to go on subjects outside of this bill. I think the Chairman has been very liberal to all the Members here. I am not charging anybody, but I think they ought not to do that.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Chairman of the committee has been liberal, but gentlemen on the other side—the gentleman from Oklahoma—consumed time on a political matter——

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman from Missouri took up five minutes a while ago.

Mr. WATKINS. With the understanding I will call for the limit of time after the gentleman has concluded, I will not make objection to his speaking for five minutes, but after the lapse of five minutes I shall ask that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the only thing is that the gentleman from Washington may open up some other subject, and it would be unfair not to let some gentleman reply; so if the Chairman is going to insist on cutting everything off after the gentleman from Washington gets through I should think that it is hardly fair.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman will permit, here a few minutes ago in this committee, when there were not more than 20 Members present, as now, they voted an amendment to this bill that is very important to my portion of the country. I said then that I was inclined to make the point of no quorum present, which would have taken 30 or 40 minutes. Now, I am not going to make any complaint, but if there is any filibuster on this bill it is not on this side of the House. I remember last Wednesday that five roll calls were demanded by gentlemen on that side of the House. I remember the reading of this bill was demanded by a distinguished gentleman on that side of the House, the gentleman from Georgia. All of last Wednesday was practically consumed by that side of the House.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is whether there is objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, this administration, from the President down, have had a great deal to say through the newspapers about observing the civil-service rules. I hold in my hand a letter that was written to me by the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, in which he stated:

> In no case is a second or third eligible to be selected, unless the appointment of the eligible, or eligibles, standing higher has been shown to be inadvisable from the standpoint of the greatest efficiency in the Postal Service.

That referred to the appointment of rural carriers. The Postmaster General has several times declared that this is the policy of the department. After receiving the letter I remembered that the State of Indiana was at this time not represented in either branch of Congress by a Republican, so I wrote the Civil Service Commission a letter and asked them to give me the last cases where certification had been made for appointment of rural carriers in that State. They sent me what had occurred since the 1st day of last January. As I remember, 18 different times names were certified for appointment for rural carriers in the State of Indiana, three names, of course, being certified in each instance.

Out of those 18 certifications, only four times was the highest man appointed. It is fair to say that in two other cases the lowest man was appointed because the highest man did not take the place, or the civil-service rules were violated absolutely 12 times out of the 18—a fair average for this Democratic administration in doing what it promises. In all the others the second or third man was appointed to the position. I took occasion to write letters to those who had not been appointed. Not a single one of them knew why they were rejected. None of them knew it if any objections had been filed against them. In every case where an appointment was made of other than the highest man the appointment went to a Democrat. What a remarkable coincidence. I undertake to say on the floor of this House now that according to the very best information that I can obtain there has not been a single appointment made in the State of Indiana under this administration of a rural carrier except he was a Democrat. Strange they can not find a Democrat in Indiana that can stand first in the civil-service examination.

I am not now especially speaking in favor of the civil service. I am simply showing the infernal, cheap hypocrisy of the Post Office Department that all the time prates about observing the civil-service rules and then in practice violates them. No pretense is made by the Fourth Assistant of obeying the civil-service law.

I sent a letter to the Post Office Department, transmitting this list of names where the rule was violated, as mentioned in the letter from the Civil Service Commission, and I asked the Fourth Assistant to explain to me why it was that these appointments had been made and to give me the objections that had been filed to the appointment of the high man and to tell me whether any Member of Congress had been down to see him about the matter and whether these appointments in Indiana were made on the recommendation of the Congressmen. He answered that such information was confidential and refused to give it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No.

Mr. DONOVAN. Do you not like to tell the truth?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will not yield.

Mr. DONOVAN. Do you not like to have the truth?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If I did, that would be one reason why I would not yield to the gentleman. I would look to a different source always.

Now, I wanted to call attention to the fact that one of these cases in Indiana was that of an old soldier. He was refused appointment in the face of the statutes and a Democrat appointed in his place. This was the case of Ross G. Miller, of Mooreland, Ind. In this case the department violated both its own rules and the law. Now, I do not care how many Democrats you appoint in Indiana, but why do you not be honest about it? But I do object to this violation of the law and this refusal to appoint soldiers. The Democratic Party is to be condemned for this action. A protest is going up from all over the country at the treatment the old soldier is receiving from this administration, and especially from the Post Office Department. What is the use of the Post Office Department pretending they are observing the civil service when they are violating it every day openly? If these appointments are not made upon the recommendation of the Congressmen from Indiana, let them stand up now and say so. If these appointments for rural carriers in the State of Indiana are not all Democrats and made upon the recommendation of the Democratic Congressman from that district, let him stand up and say so, and if he says it is not true, then I will withdraw any implication that may be contained in the statement.

Now, I want to put in the RECORD this entire correspondence between the Post Office Department and myself and the Civil Service Commission, in order that the people of this country may know to just what extent the Post Office Department is sincere when it comes out with its interviews every few days and says that they are making appointments only upon merit. Upon my desk I have a clipping from the Star, only two or three days old, in which the Postmaster General repeats that statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman intend to put in the RECORD this fact, that the displacing of these officials he speaks of has been done the same as the Republicans have been doing for 16 years, and that now he has become virtuous and does not like that way of doing? Is that what he intends to put in the RECORD? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to put in the RECORD what the Democratic administration is doing. If the gentleman wishes to plead the wrong of the Republican Party in justification, he can do that.

Mr. DONOVAN. And will the gentleman say it has been done that way by the Republicans the last 16 years, and that now he objects to that way of doing it? Is not that what he intends to say?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will say that it has not been done by the Republicans in that way in my State.

The only defense made by this virtuous Democratic administration for violating the civil-service law is that it was violated by the Republicans. Yet every few days we are entertained by a publicity story sent out from the White House or from one of the departments telling how this administration is upholding the civil-service law and how all the offices go to those who stand first on the eligible list.

Mr. BRYAN. I hope that both of the gentlemen will permit that to go in as a record of both of the old parties. They both operate just alike. It takes the Progressive Party to do things correctly.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The Progressive Party has no record. When it does it will be time to place it in the record. So far its only record is made with the mouth, and it is at least long.

The Indianapolis News had a few days ago an editorial praising this administration for observing the civil-service law. Yet everyone except the News knew that civil service since this administration went into power, in Indiana at least, is a farce, an admitted farce. More than that, most of the Democrats of that State publicly and privately boast of this fact. The offices in Indiana to-day are filled not according to civil-service law, but according to the request of Senators and Representatives from that State, so far as the Post Office Department is concerned. The Indiana delegation has already been notified by the department that they can practically name the postmasters in that State after the form of a civil-service examination has been held. It is strange how all these facts are known to all except the News. I trust that splendid paper will study the exhibits I am going to place in the RECORD and then write another virtuous editorial of praise of this administration for observing the civil-service law.

I insert, first, the letter sent me by the Fourth Assistant on April 2, 1914. Here we see the high resolve that merit alone must prevail. "In no case is a second or third eligible to be selected" unless for "the good of the service." No politics, no favorites. Charges must be made or "the highest-rated eligible" will in every case be appointed. This is the same stuff that the Postmaster General gave to the world with loud acclaim in a statement as far back as November 17, 1913. The letter is as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, April 2, 1914.

Hon. WILLIAM E. HUMPHREY,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. HUMPHREY: Referring to your letters of February 7 and March 27 in behalf of the appointment of Mr. John J. Preece as rural carrier at Kirkland, Wash., I beg to state that, under the instructions of the Postmaster General, in filling vacancies in the rural-carrier force the person with the highest rating is selected unless good and valid reasons are submitted to the department showing that such action would not be in the best interests of the service. "In no case is a second or third eligible to be selected unless the appointment of the eligible, or eligibles, standing higher has been shown to be inadvisable from the standpoint of the greatest efficiency in the Postal Service."

In the absence of any charges of unfitness against Albert Bouin, of Kirkland, the highest-rated eligible, his appointment to fill the vacancy at that place has been ordered, effective May 1, 1914.

Sincerely, yours,

JAS. I. BLAKSLEE,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

Here is the first paragraph of the Postmaster General's statement referred to:

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL ISSUED THE FOLLOWING STATEMENT ON NOVEMBER 17, 1913.

In answering an inquiry recently as to what influence political affiliations would have in fourth-class postmaster and rural-carrier appointments, Postmaster General Burleson stated that he desired it distinctly understood that it is his purpose to carry out the intent of President Wilson's order that these positions be filled in accordance with both the spirit and letter of the civil-service law. The Postmaster General added that he does not delegate the power of appointment, nor in any case is selection made simply upon or because of a recommendation of a Member of Congress. He stated further that he has a duty to perform in making selections under the civil-service rules; that it is his desire to select in every case the most efficient man obtainable; and that in furtherance of such desire he is using, and intends to continue to use, every available means of ascertaining the best of the men certified to him by the Civil Service Commission.

Now, keeping in mind those highly commendable statements, I ask you to read my letter to the Civil Service Commission and their reply:

APRIL 9, 1914.

SECRETARY CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: It is my understanding that the Post Office Department has adopted the rule that in making the appointment of rural carriers that the person having the highest grade of the three certified is appointed unless good and valid reasons are submitted to the department showing that such action would not be in the best interests of the service, meaning, I presume, that if there were some objection against the person having the highest grade. I wish you would give me a list of the last 20 cases in the State of Indiana where the person having the highest grade was not appointed as rural carrier and also the name of the person appointed in each instance, together with the address of the person appointed and the other persons certified. If 20 cases of this kind have not occurred in the State of Indiana since March 4, 1913, then give me the number of cases that have occurred.

I hope I have made myself clear as to what I want, and that is that I want the list of names and the addresses of the three persons certified for rural carriers in Indiana in each instance where the highest man has not been selected by the department.

Yours, truly,

W. E. HUMPHREY.

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., April 17, 1914.

Hon. W. E. HUMPHREY,
House of Representatives.

SIR: The commission has the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of April 9, stating that it is your understanding that the Post Office Department has adopted the rule of selecting for appointment to the position of rural carrier the person having the highest grade of the three certified unless good and valid reasons are submitted to the department showing that such action would not be in the best interests of the service, and requesting a list of the last 20 cases in the State of Indiana, where the person having the highest grade was not appointed as rural carrier, with the names of the person appointed in each case and the other persons certified with their addresses. If 20 cases of this kind have not occurred in the State of Indiana since March 4, 1913, you request to be given the information for the cases which have occurred.

The commission incloses a statement covering 20 certificates issued in 1914, which are all that have been reported upon to date. It is hoped that this information will serve your purpose.

The commission is physically unable on account of its limited force to comply with all the requests it receives for information of various kinds. The commission's work has been very heavy for the past year. The number of applicants for examination for appointment as railway mail clerks, clerks and carriers in post offices, and other clerical and subclerical positions has greatly increased, and the commission is putting forth every effort to complete the holding of examinations under the President's order of May 7, 1913, for fourth-class post offices at which the incumbents were not appointed under civil-service regulations. The commission has also held and is still holding examinations to obtain employees needed in connection with the physical valuation of railroads which is being undertaken by the Interstate Commerce Commission. If the commission were to undertake to comply fully with the many requests it receives for information, the establishment of registers urgently needed by the departments would be delayed and the public business seriously embarrassed.

There is inclosed copy of instructions to applicants for the rural carrier examination. The regulation governing certification is found in paragraph 24. Paragraph 25 contains the President's order regarding selections for appointment. There is also inclosed copy of the statement of the Postmaster General issued on November 17, 1913, with reference to the selection of eligibles for the positions of rural carrier and fourth-class postmaster.

Under the civil-service rules the department may select any one of three eligibles certified, and the commission can not interfere so long as the requirements as to selection are observed. The department is not required to report to the commission its reasons for the selection or failure to select any eligible for appointment.

By direction of the commission.

Very respectfully, J. A. MCILHENNY,
President.

Now, I ask you to read the letter I wrote to the Fourth Assistant and his reply:

MAY 7, 1914.

Hon. JAMES I. BLAKSLEE,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BLAKSLEE: On April 2, 1914, I received a letter from you in regard to the appointment of Mr. John J. Preece as rural carrier at Kirkland, Wash. In that letter you use the following language:

"In no case is a second or third eligible to be selected unless the appointment of the eligible or eligibles standing higher has been shown to be inadvisable from the standpoint of the greatest efficiency in the Postal Service."

I am also in receipt of a copy of a statement issued by the Postmaster General, under date of November 17, 1913, in which he says, among other things:

"In answering an inquiry recently as to what influence political affiliations would have in fourth-class postmaster and rural-carrier appointments, Postmaster General Burleson stated that he desired it distinctly understood that it is his purpose to carry out the intent of President Wilson's order that these positions be filled in accordance with both the spirit and letter of the civil-service law. The Postmaster General added that he does not delegate the power of appointment nor in any case is selection made simply upon or because of a recommendation of a Member of Congress."

[1] Selected for appointment.
[2] Declined appointment.
[3] Preferred soldier, per section 1754, Revised Statutes.

Following are his directions to the First Assistant Postmaster General:

"In selecting persons from the eligible registers furnished by the Civil Service Commission for appointment as fourth-class postmasters, it is my desire that the person with the highest rating be chosen, unless good and valid reasons are submitted to the department showing that this would not be in the best interest of the service. If reasons are submitted sufficient to make the selection of the first eligible inadvisable, then it is my desire that the person with the next highest rating be chosen, unless good and valid reasons are submitted to show the inadvisability of his appointment. In such case the third eligible may be selected. In no case should the second or third eligible be chosen unless the appointment of one of the higher standing eligibles has been shown to be inadvisable from the standpoint of the greatest efficiency in the Postal Service."

In view of the statement made in your letter and in view of the statements quoted from the letter of the Postmaster General, I ask you for information in regard to the following appointments. I have received a communication from the Civil Service Commission, from which I will quote the names of those who were certified and the names of those who were appointed in certain instances in Indiana. These quotations from the letter of the Civil Service Commission are as follows:

Now, in each of the above cases it will be noted that the man having the highest grade was not appointed. Please give me the reason for refusal to appoint in each of these cases. At whose instance and request was the appointment of the highest man refused? What protests, if any, have you on file in each case against appointing the highest man? What part, if any, did the Congressmen from Indiana take in these protests? Please give me the name of each man who stood highest on the list against whom a protest was filed by a Member of Congress, and give a copy of the protest filed, if it was in writing.

In other words, to make my proposition clear, I want the reason given by you for the refusal to recommend the appointment of the men having the highest grade in each of the cases above mentioned and the evidence upon which you based your action. Kindly give me an immediate reply.

Yours, truly, W. E. HUMPHREY.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, May 11, 1914.

Hon. W. E. HUMPHREY,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. HUMPHREY: In reply to your letter of the 7th instant, inquiring as to the reasons that influenced the department in making appointments to the position of rural carrier at certain post offices in Indiana, I beg to state that in the cases mentioned by you good and valid reasons were presented to the department why the appointment of certain eligibles was inadvisable from the standpoint of the greatest efficiency in the Postal Service. Such reasons are on file with the individual cases and constitute records of the department that are considered confidential.

Sincerely, yours, JAS. I. BLAKSLEE,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

[1] Preferred soldier, per section 1754, Revised Statutes.
[2] Selected for appointment.

How is that reply for an administration pledged to "pitiless publicity"? They have kept that pledge about as well as they did their pledge in regard to the Panama Canal.

In every case where the highest man was not appointed he was condemned in secret. He had no chance to answer any attacks made upon his integrity or ability. Of course, charges were filed against each of them, for the Fourth Assistant so asserts. The reputation of American citizens is assassinated in secret under this administration, whose high sense of duty to mankind has driven it to make war upon an individual in Mexico rather than that he should be ruler without the consent honestly and constitutionally expressed by the majority of the people of Mexico. Let us hope for another pæan of praise from the Indianapolis News.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all discussion of this amendment be closed in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent——

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent for five minutes' time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request that the debate on this section and amendments thereto close in five minutes?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DIXON] may have five minutes.

Mr. WATKINS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, does that include the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DIXON]?

The CHAIRMAN. It gives the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] five minutes and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DIXON] five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I hope the gentleman will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DIXON] is recognized.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, the criticism that has just been made by the gentleman from the State of Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] is the highest encomium that could be given concerning the management of the Post Office Department under this administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

What is that criticism? That a number of rural carriers have recently been appointed in Indiana; that said appointees were not the highest of the three eligibles certified to the Post Office Department; that the appointees had all been Democrats; that the promise of the Postmaster General that efficiency alone would control in these appointments had not been fulfilled; and that the civil-service law was disregarded.

If the gentleman knew anything about the administration of the civil-service law in the State of Indiana under Republican administrations even he would not find fault with the Post Office Department for appointing a few Democrats there. Under Republican administrations the civil-service law has been administered with such skill that Republicans only have been appointed under its provisions, and under such manipulations its administration has merited and received the contempt and ridicule of the people of all political parties of that State.

Without reference to the grades of Democratic candidates, without reference to the character and standing of Democratic candidates who have taken these examination in the past, it has practically been an impossibility for a Democrat in our State to be appointed as rural mail carrier. With a population that has in the past been about equally divided between the two great political parties in this country, not over 5 per cent of the rural mail carriers in our State have been Democrats, and this per cent has not been very much increased under the present administration. The objections by the gentleman from the State of Washington to the appointment of the 18 Democrats in the State of Indiana that might slightly increase the present per cent of Democratic carriers is not a reflection upon the Post Office Department, but is, in fact, a compliment to that department.

If the President of the United States would set aside the civil-service law as to rural carriers, his action would receive, I believe, the sanction of the people of my State, because they know how it has been administered under the Republican administration, as the civil-service law was practically a dead letter as far as accomplishing the real purposes of its enactment. At least the people would approve a similar rule as to the rural mail carriers as provided in the President's order as to fourth-class post offices—that is, to put all the present carriers and all applicants for said positions upon an examination, and let real merit control in the selection of the men who are to hold the positions of rural mail carriers in our State.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. DIXON. I will not yield, because the gentleman would not yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman did not ask me to yield.

Mr. DIXON. I will yield in a few moments.

Now, what are the facts as to the basis of the gentleman's criticism. First, that a number of rural mail carriers have been appointed in Indiana. The number, unfortunately, has been small, and they have been limited to cases where the carriers have died, resigned, or been removed on account of incompetency and gross neglect of duty, and in most cases the charges have been examined by Republican post-office inspectors and removed only when recommended by these inspectors, and it is not hard to understand why the number has been so small. Then, the gentleman says that in 14 of the 18 appointments mentioned by him the highest eligible certified was not appointed, and in many of the cases the third man certified received the appointment. Formerly when a vacancy occurred an examination was held for the purpose of filling that one vacancy, and those living in that immediate neighborhood where the vacancy occurred were the ones who took the examination, with a result that the carriers selected were residents and patrons of the office where the vacancy occurred.

Under the present rule where a vacancy occurs an examination is held not only to fill that vacancy, but to fill all vacancies that may occur within the county during the year, and the examination is usually held at the county seat, and the natural result is that a large list of candidates from all parts of the county take the examination and indicate that they are willing to accept any vacancy that may occur within the county. Now, when there is a vacancy on any route within the county the names of the two receiving the highest grades, together with the name of the one who resides at the place where the vacancy occurs and receives the highest grade of those residing at that place, is placed upon the list and these three names are certified to the Post Office Department by the Civil Service Commission, and from these three names the appointment must be made. Now, what is the natural result? When a vacancy exists upon a particular route the two men having the highest grades may live 15 to 20 miles from the place where the vacancy exists and be entirely unacquainted with the people in the community and especially the patrons he would serve on the route. The people prefer to have some man from their own neighborhood as their mail carrier, and the result is that they file objections and protests against these nonresident applicants and the local man is preferred, and this is frequently one of the reasons why the highest man is not selected, and the final objection of the gentleman is that those appointed were Democrats. I have no doubt the other Members from Indiana follow the same course as I do, and that is to secure the selection of a Democrat wherever it is possible to do so, but it can not be done under the present system unless the Democrat is the highest upon the list or there are good and valid reasons why those above him should not be appointed. I do not know what letters and documents the gentleman refers to and that he will print in the RECORD, but I have understood that one of the cases that he has correspondence concerning is in my district, and that the third man on the list of eligibles was appointed.

The first name on the eligible list was that of a man who was teaching school in a distant State, but whose parents reside in the district, but at a great distance from the place where the vacancy occurred, and the Republican postmaster would not recommend his selection, but did recommend the selection of the second man, whose political affiliations were the same as the postmaster but against whom objections were made, and after examination and consideration of the same it was determined that the former experience of the third eligible in the mail service and his record for efficiency and his residence at the place where the vacancy occurred entitled him to the appointment for the good of the Postal Service, and the appointment met with the hearty approval of practically every patron of the route, and I am very glad, indeed, to say that this efficient, experienced, and qualified applicant was a Democrat. [Applause of the Democratic side.] The gentleman's statements that all the appointees to Rural Mail Service in Indiana since the 1st of January have been Democrats is not true, and I regret that it is not true; as a matter of fact, there have been quite a number of Republican carriers appointed in Indiana, but if I could control the appointments made by the Post Office Department they would all have been Democrats. [Applause on the Democratic side.] These Republican appointments were made by the present administration, and, to be frank upon the subject, over the protest of the Democratic Congressmen. If the civil-service law had been administered in our State with any regard to the spirit of that law, there would be a different feeling upon the subject, but with the facts as they are and the treatment that Democratic applicants have been subjected to in the past, it is but natural that we should rejoice when we can get even a Democratic carrier. I have known of examinations in my district where Democratic school-teachers and boys recently graduated from high schools have taken these examinations, and Republican candidates with lower grades and not as well qualified for the position have been repeatedly appointed as carriers. In the district that I have the honor to represent there are 11 counties and 205 rural carriers, and upon the 1st of January this year there were but 21 Democrats and 184 Republican rural-mail carriers. No one acquainted with the people in that district would say but that in every respect the Democrats could pass as successful examinations as the Republicans, and they have passed those examinations in the past, and the result is shown in these figures.

I can cite one case where a young man was a graduate from the high school, served his country in the Spanish War, and his name was placed upon the eligible list; but the man appointed was a Republican politician who had completed but the seventh grade in the public schools. I know of another case where a Democratic boy graduated from the high school and from one of the State colleges and was the highest upon the list, yet the man who was appointed was a son of a local politician, who was also an employee of the Government; and innumerable other instances could be cited to show how efficient and capable Democrats were turned down without reference to their efficiency as shown by their grades. The reasons for such appointments are well understood by the people of Indiana. In three of the counties in my district, with an aggregate number of 64 rural carriers, there was not a single Democrat among them on the 1st of last January, and there is not a man, woman, or child in those counties that does not know that those carriers were selected because they were Republicans and not on account of efficiency, and that many of them were appointed over Democratic candidates with greater efficiency, as shown by the records of the Civil Service Commission; and can you expect our people to have much respect for such administration of the civil-service law? Within the last few months there have been examinations in three counties in my district for rural carriers, and the result is that upon the eligible list in one county there are 23 Democrats and 5 Republicans, in the second county 38 Democrats and 14 Republicans, and in the third county 31 Democrats, 3 Republicans, and 1 Bull Mooser. Democrats head the list in each county. In these three counties there are 87 rural carriers, and of those carriers there were but 8 Democrats; and in one of the counties not a single Democratic carrier. These examinations demonstrate that the Democrats are able to pass the examinations and to get their names upon the eligible lists, but if the Republicans were still administering the civil-service law there would be no Democrats appointed to any vacancies that might occur in those counties. The civil-service law, as administered by the Republicans, has been but a sham and a fraud, and now for the gentleman from the State of Washington to reflect upon the administration of the Post Office Department because a few Democrats in the State of Indiana have been appointed as rural carriers in strict conformity to the rules of the civil-service law shows to what extent he is willing to go in order to find something to criticize in a Democratic administration. By the people of our State his criticism will be regarded as an evidence of merit of the Democratic administration and the Post Office Department, and we only regret that there are not more vacancies, in order that we could secure more Democratic appointees. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. I understand that this provision of the law giving witnesses in the Federal courts $1.50 per day was enacted about 1870. Since that time there is scarcely a State in the Union but has increased the allowance for witnesses in the State courts.

I was impressed with the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], that on matters of this kind the fees ought to be the same in the Federal courts, or at least as much, as they are paid to witnesses in the State courts.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I say to the gentleman that I think the law was passed in 1853?

Mr. GOOD. I thank the gentleman for the information. I made inquiry and was told that it was passed in 1870; but, be that as it may, at least we have come to a time now when we ought in justice to these persons who are subpœnaed and called to attend court and testify in civil cases to make an allowance that is fair. The least that can be said is that $2 per day is not too much to allow a witness in a civil case in the Federal court.

A good deal has been said in regard to the poor litigant. As a rule the poor litigant is the person who brings the suit, because nobody is going to sue a person that has nothing with which to respond in damages. When a man brings a case into the Federal court and travels 15 or 20 miles with witnesses, he obviously must pay them more than $1.50 a day.

Mr. CULLOP rose.

Mr. GOOD. I can not yield now. If he recovers, he can only recover $1.50 a day for the attendance of each witness. He, of course, was obliged to pay more than that, and so the rich litigant is the person who reaps the benefit by reason of our paying a smaller amount than the litigant must pay.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do think that this committee ought not to insist that this amendment should be defeated. I believe that it is a meritorious amendment. I believe the gentlemen on that side must admit that $2 a day is too little to pay the witnesses in the Federal court and $1.50 is simply ridiculous. I hope the amendment will prevail. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for one minute.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman can not yield time.

Mr. GOOD. I yield a minute.

Mr. BARTLETT. But the gentleman can not yield the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania for one minute.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, referring to the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP], who seemed to think that the poor man would be prejudiced if the fees for witnesses were increased, I want to say that in such experience as I have had as a reporter for the courts the man who could group the witnesses and hold them together had the advantage of the poor man who could not afford to bring them back. The poor man must always suffer where a continuance of the case is asked for. I refer particularly to trials in city districts, and I wish to say it is just as difficult to hold the witnesses together for the poor litigant there as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] indicates it is with witnesses coming from a long distance in the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MOORE) there were 21 ayes and 5 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 96. No officer of the United States courts in any State or Territory or the District of Columbia shall be entitled to witness fees for attending before any court or commissioner where he is officiating.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Missouri did not seem to approve of some statements I made a few moments ago about the procedure we are engaged in. He suggested that this was an important bill. Of course a codification is important.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the amendment. Of course the gentleman from Wyoming understands that if the point of order is made he must confine himself to the amendment before the House.

Mr. MONDELL. Of course if the gentleman from Illinois is insistent that nothing shall be discussed except the word which I propose to strike out, he can compel me to confine myself to that word; but I want to suggest to him that up to a few moments ago I had consumed no time whatever during the consideration of this matter before the committee.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask the gentleman in all fairness if he does not think I am right. I have no objection to the gentleman speaking, but the gentleman from Wyoming made a speech and so did the gentleman from Missouri. Now, after having both got through, it seemed to me that it is time to proceed with the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. But the gentleman from Wyoming had not got through.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, if the gentleman will get through in five minutes, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I had intended to speak on the bill, and had intended to call attention to the situation which confronts us. Here is this bill. It is important in its way. A codification is important, but a codification can wait. It does not change law, it simply codifies; it puts the law in such shape that attorneys can refer to it more readily, speedily, and advantageously, but it is not supposed to contain important changes of law.

Mr. FRANCIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. FRANCIS. Was it necessary when the Republican Party a few years ago appointed a commission for this same purpose?

Mr. MONDELL. I said that a codification was important; but this bill is not so important as some others it displaces, and it is simply a buffer at this time.

Mr. FRANCIS. And when that party had a bill on the calendar for a whole session?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, everything in this world is relative. I am speaking of the relative importance of matters.

Mr. FRANCIS. Relative to what?

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman is going to make my speech for me I will give him the floor.

Mr. FRANCIS. I believe I could do it, but I do not want to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman refuses to yield further.

Mr. MONDELL. A codification is important, but a codification is not so important as many other measures at this time, particularly a codification which can not become a law.

Mr. FRANCIS. Why not? Because the gentleman is going to prevent it? Is that the reason?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman knows that even if the House passes this bill the Senate will not consider it.

Mr. FRANCIS. How does the gentleman know that? Is he speaking for the Senate?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, I am not speaking for the Senate.

Mr. FRANCIS. Then why does the gentleman undertake to do it?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to have the gentleman's question stand as an indication of his information and his intelligence with regard to the procedure of Congress. There is not a man in the House but knows, unless the gentleman who has just spoken is the exception, that the Senate under no possibility will take this bill up at this session. If the gentleman does not know that fact and is not acquainted with it, I am sorry for him.

Mr. FRANCIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will not.

Mr. FRANCIS. There is another session of this Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman refuses to yield.

Mr. MONDELL. In the meantime there is the suffrage amendment and the prohibition amendment, neither of which gentlemen on that side of the House want to vote upon, and there are conservation bills and the workmen's compensation bill, which can not be considered because of the pussy-footed filibuster which is being carried on—and I am using the words of a gentleman on that side in regard to that matter. What I particularly object to is this: If this pussy-footed filibuster, this useless expenditure of time, keeping out other important legislation which could become law, and preventing the consideration of such legislation, if it must go on, it should go on in an orderly way. When we are considering a bill of this character the chairman of the committee at least should protect and defend his bill. That is what he is here for, and there are some of us who will insist that a quorum shall pass upon any real, substantial amendments to this bill. Members have been assuming that what the gentleman from Louisiana in charge of the bill desires is the consideration and passage of this bill as introduced by the committee, and that the chairman is going to defend the work of his committee, a work which the gentleman from Missouri says he is largely responsible for and entitled to much credit for. If the gentleman is not going to defend his bill, but is going to accept without protest or proper consideration important amendments as offered, it may be that some of us will insist that there shall be more than a handful of Members present. We shall be inclined to insist that if this farce is to go on, the farce shall consume the time of others besides a few of us who feel it our duty to be here under any and all circumstances and conditions.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman admit that all of these amendments that have been offered and which have been agreed to by the chairman of the committee have been amendments offered by the membership on the Republican side of the House?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, I do not admit anything of the kind; but if that were the case it would not change the principle involved. Of course ordinarily an amendment offered from this side of the House is much more likely to be a good amendment than if it came from the other side of the House. That is true, but at the same time if the gentleman is so proud of his bill and is entitled to as much credit as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] has given him for it, then it is the duty of the gentleman to protect the bill and defend it against all substantial controverted amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I desire to direct the attention of the chairman of the committee to the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] previously adopted to the preceding paragraph. I make this statement so that gentlemen can consider it between now and the following Wednesday. I said when the amendment was under consideration that this amendment would add 15 cents a mile in addition to the 5 cents a mile to which he would be entitled under the first clause of the paragraph, section 95. Some gentleman stated that the last proviso at the bottom of page 60 provided—that no constructive or double mileage fees shall be allowed by reason of any person being summoned both as witness and juror, or as witness in two or more cases pending in the same court, and triable at the same term thereof.

It was stated that that would prevent that double mileage. The gentleman will see that that does not refer to that case at all; but in the form of the amendment that has been incorporated in the bill, it will permit these witnesses who have to travel by stage coaches not only 15 cents allowance, but they will also be entitled to the 5 cents allowance provided for in the first paragraph. That was not intended by the gentleman from California; that was not the purpose he had in mind; and I hope the gentleman from Louisiana will give consideration to that amendment between now and next Wednesday so as to revise the amendment and carry out the purpose intended by the gentleman from California. The gentleman from California certainly did not intend to pay those who have to travel in stage coaches 20 cents a mile.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

JURORS' FEES.

SEC. 100. For actual attendance at any court or courts, and for the time necessarily occupied in going to and returning from the same, $3 a day. For the distance necessarily traveled in going from their residence to and returning from said court by the shortest practicable route, 5 cents a mile: Provided, That jurors in the United States courts in the States of Wyoming, Montana, Washington, Oregon, California, Nevada, Idaho, Colorado, Utah, New Mexico, and Arizona shall be entitled to and receive 15 cents for each mile necessarily traveled over any stage line or by private conveyance, and 5 cents for each mile over any railway in going to and returning from said courts: Provided further, That no constructive or double mileage fees shall be allowed by reason of any person being summoned both as witness and juror.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 63, line 1, after the word "traveled," insert the words "when coming from the place of residence outside the city or village where the court is held."

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Chairman, the effect of this amendment will be that no juror attending court in any city, village, or town where court is held will be entitled to mileage if he is a resident thereof. I do not know just what the practice is now, but I know in the New York State courts we do not allow jurors mileage if they are attending court in the city where they reside. For instance, we might have a case in the city of New York or the city of Chicago, where the jurors would have to come 15 miles from the suburbs of the city. The juror could ride the 15 miles for 5 cents, and return for 5 cents, and yet he would be allowed 75 cents each way, or $1.50 mileage, if the amendment just submitted is not agreed to.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I desire to place in the RECORD a telegram that would have been in better order a few days ago, from Oklahoma City, Okla. It is as follows:

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA., May 15, 1914.

Hon. R. P. HOBSON,
United States Congress, Washington, D. C.:

The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, assembled in Oklahoma City, representing 2,000,000 members, passes this resolution, without opposition:

"Resolved, That this general conference indorses the Hobson amendment now pending before our National Congress, and petitions our national legislators to speedily give us the legislation sought therein. Our people are long since wearied of the monster evil—the liquor traffic—and are now praying for its expatriation."

A. F. WATKINS, Secretary.

Also the following telegram:

WINKELMAN, ARIZ., May 15, 1914.

Hon. RICHMOND P. HOBSON,
Washington, D. C.:

More than a score of names on the protest against your prohibition bill sent from this place May 13 were obtained by fraud. Letter, with names and explanations, will follow.

MRS. DELIA C. HALSEY.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBSON. Does the gentleman refer to me?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. HOBSON. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. I will ask the gentleman whether he is asking for action upon his amendment at this session of Congress?

Mr. HOBSON. I am very glad to answer the gentleman by stating that the proposed amendment, as shown by the resolution reported from the Judiciary Committee, is not in the final form that it is desired to be by its friends. The Judiciary Committee of the House was requested to insert certain amendments bearing upon State rights in particular, and the committee did not insert them, evidently, because it took no action at all. If we had known that the committee was to send in the resolution as originally drawn, we would have introduced a new resolution, and our plan is when the Senate committee takes action to have that committee report the resolution in the final form agreeable to all its friends, which we believe will remove all objections from the standpoint of State rights.

And then when it is on the calendar of the Senate we can in due time and in due order take it up more intelligently in the House. For that reason we are not urging the vote at this time—not asking for a rule.

Mr. TOWNER. I thank the gentleman for the statement. I think it ought to be made publicly and in the form the gentleman has made it, because there is a misapprehension regarding the matter, some contending that the gentleman will ask for action at this session of Congress and others that he will not. As I understand it now the gentleman will not ask for action upon the resolution as presented by the committee to Congress?

Mr. HOBSON. Not at the present time. There is no intention at the present time of the friends of the measure to ask for its present consideration.

Mr. PETERSON. The gentleman says that a request for an amendment was presented to the Judiciary Committee. I would like to ask him to state in what form and when such a request was made to that committee.

Mr. HOBSON. The form was worked out by joint suggestion from members of the Judiciary Committee and officials representing the temperance associations, which was acceptable to the friends of the resolution. On the same day that the hearing was held I was authorized by these officials to write a letter to the chairman of the committee and officially request on the part of the friends of the resolution that such an amendment be incorporated in the report of the committee.

Mr. PETERSON. Let me ask the gentleman a further question. Did you write such a letter and was it ever presented to the committee?

Mr. HOBSON. I wrote it the day of the hearing, and it was officially sent to the chairman and received by him.

Mr. PETERSON. Have you an acknowledgment of that?

Mr. HOBSON. Yes.

Mr. PETERSON. Will you state that it was ever presented to the committee?

Mr. HOBSON. Oh, I can not state what happened in the committee, of course.

Mr. PETERSON. I will say that no such request was ever presented to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HOBSON. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am in receipt of letters from a number of my constituents urging me not only to support the resolution but also to urge its early consideration at this session. I understand from the gentleman's statement to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] that those of us who are receiving those communications can reply to our constituents that it is not the purpose or wish of the author of the resolution and of the friends of the resolution in the House that that resolution should be pressed for consideration in the House at this present time or session?

Mr. HOBSON. At this present time. The gentleman can say that. But I am not in a position to state, after the Senate takes action——

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand. Then I can put it in this way: "Until the Senate does act"?

Mr. HOBSON. Until the Senate committee acts.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then, until the Senate committee reports the bill out to the Senate and it places it on the calendar, it is not the desire of yourself or the friends of the resolution that action should be had or pressed in the House?

Mr. HOBSON. That is substantially it. Provided the Senate committee does act, in a reasonable time——

Mr. ANDERSON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. I ask that he may have two minutes. I would like to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked for two minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANDERSON. I merely wanted to ask the gentleman if the amended resolution, or the resolution with the amendment he suggests, has been introduced?

Mr. HOBSON. No. I will say to the gentleman that it probably will be introduced at an early date.

Mr. ANDERSON. Does not the gentleman think that the Members of the House are entitled to know what is going to be done with this resolution and in what form the friends of the resolution propose to urge it?

Mr. HOBSON. I think the gentleman is entitled to such information, and it is our hope within a few days to have a statement made on the floor of the House and possibly on the floor of the Senate. We hope the final form will be the form reported out by the Senate committee. We are simply waiting for action by that committee, or, at least, the subcommittee.

Mr. ANDERSON. All of us are getting a large number of letters and telegrams with respect to this resolution. The replies we make will necessarily be dependent on the form in which the resolution comes to the House.

Mr. HOBSON. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. ANDERSON. It seems to me, whether the gentleman intends to press the resolution or not, he ought to put it in such form as that Members may readily understand it.

Mr. HOBSON. The gentleman is right. That request will be complied with at a very early date.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HOBSON. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is the next one who wanted to ask a question.

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand the gentleman from Alabama to say it is not his expectation to press for a vote on the prohibition amendment? It is the intention of the friends of the equal-suffrage amendment to press for a rule and a vote, and we would be glad to have the opportunity to vote on both amendments.

Mr. HOBSON. I am not prepared to say that the friends of this prohibition resolution do not wish to have a vote taken at this session, but I am prepared to say that for the present and until a report is made by the Senate subcommittee we do not intend to urge it.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. HOBSON. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. The only reason why the gentleman is hesitating about urging it is because he is convinced for some reason or other that it can not pass. Would he not urge it if he thought it could pass?

Mr. HOBSON. I will say that there are many Members, particularly from the Southern States, who are for prohibition and who are with us and will end by voting with us who have been frightened by the second section of that resolution on the question of State rights, and widespread misrepresentation has been going on, particularly in the Southern States, with regard to the question of State rights. When that question is straightened out, as we are sure it will be by the final form of the resolution, we will consider the question of coming to a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SCOTT] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 62, line 26, by striking out the word "three" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "five."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the amendment, as is evident, raises the pay of jurors in Federal courts from $3 a day to $5 per day. I think it is a matter of common knowledge that $3 a day not only fails to pay jurors in Federal courts any compensation but, in fact, falls short of covering the actual expenses of jurors when so serving.

We all know that the Federal courts are held in cities of considerable size. We all know that the expense attendant upon sojourning in a city at this time is very much larger than it was when this statute was adopted. The old American-plan hotel is a thing of the past. A juror called to attendance upon a Federal court now must pay not only a hotel bill equal to what he used to pay when he got his three meals but he must buy his three meals in addition thereto.

The class of men drawn upon juries in Federal courts are men of business; they are men whose time is valuable; they are men who are expected to stay, and who do stay, in respectable hotels. As was suggested some little time ago by my colleague, Judge TOWNER, it is highly important, and one of the material considerations in the transaction of judicial business, that all men connected with the tribunals of justice, all of the officials of courts, shall have at least sufficient compensation to cover their expenses. Jurors are called from all parts of a judicial district; in my State, covering half of the State, and in many of the States covering the entire State. It is not the rule even to confine the limits of the call for jurors to the division in which the court sits, but it reaches out over the entire district, and the expense is considerable.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. SCOTT. I do.

Mr. LLOYD. Is it not true that in the gentleman's State the railroad mileage is only 2 cents, so that an individual, when he travels by rail, would have 3 cents a mile to apply to his expense account?

Mr. SCOTT. That is true; but the 3 cents per mile, assuming that the witness was called 100 or 150 miles, would go but a little way in covering the expenses of a juror. He might be detained some two or three weeks, or sometimes a month, in attendance upon a term of court. The result of this is that practically every juror called in attendance upon a Federal court, if he is such a juror as ought to be there, goes about, as the first thing he does after he arrives in the city, to see if he can not get excused, to get home, to be rid of the expense, and to attend to his business affairs.

Now, I am not going to say that this would make any great difference, but at the same time it is bad policy and bad business to call for men to serve for any considerable length of time in the Federal courts and not pay them sufficient to cover their actual expenses. If this was a matter of compensation for time, it would be different, but we all know that jurors are obliged to pay out more than they receive if they have to attend for any considerable time on the court. It is well known that only one mileage is allowed. If a juror is called to go a considerable distance and held for three or four weeks, he returns home once a week at least to attend to his business.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be voted down. We are getting into the curve, along the line of extravagance, and if we do not check it somewhere I do not know where it will end. To add $2 to the pay of jurors—nearly doubling it—is out of all question. We can not think of that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment: Line 8, page 63, strike out the words "or by private conveyance." That corresponds with the amendment offered as affecting witnesses.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 63, line 8, strike out the words "or by private conveyance."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 103. In cases where the United States are parties, the marshal shall, on the order of the court, to be entered on its minutes, pay to the jurors and witnesses all fees to which they appear by such order to be entitled, which sum shall be allowed him at the Treasury in his accounts.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, on page 64, line 7, section 103, after the words "United States," I move to strike out the words "are parties" and insert "is a party."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 64, line 7, strike out the words "are parties" and insert the words "is a party."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 104. The fees of clerks and commissioners, in cases where the United States are liable to pay the same, shall be paid on settling their accounts at the Treasury.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I presume the chairman overlooked. I move to strike out the word "are" and insert the word "is," in line 13, after the word "States."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In the existing law we find that this paragraph includes district attorneys and marshals. I wish to direct the attention of the chairman, in view of the fact that we intend to provide a salary for the clerks of the United States courts, whether the provision should include clerks or whether that should be eliminated.

Mr. WATKINS. I do not believe there would be much difference, in view of the fact that they simply account for the fees, and their salary would not be affected.

Mr. STAFFORD. If they are not going to have any fees after they are put on a salary——

Mr. WATKINS. They do not get the fees, but they have to account for them. They are collected just the same.

Mr. STAFFORD. Perhaps it might be better to retain the word, and I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 105. The fees and compensation of the officers and persons hereinbefore mentioned, except those which are directed to be paid out of the Treasury, shall be recovered in like manner as the fees of the officers of the States, respectively, for like services are recovered.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUSSELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15578) to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SELDOMRIDGE, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. FERGUSSON, for four days, on account of illness.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 1243. An act directing the issuance of patent to John Russell.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Interstate Trade Commission.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the Interstate Trade Commission. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has the right to extend his remarks under the rule.

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion, the Chair wishes to state that under the rule it appears as if there would be a session to-night, but the regular rules of the House provide that a recess can not be taken on Calendar Wednesday, and the Chair construes it in that way.

The motion of Mr. WATKINS was agreed to; accordingly the House (at 5 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 21, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 21, 1914.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee that Thou hast given to all Thy creatures a high sense of moral obligation. Thy law stands guard over all the rights of men. We recognize the great truth that might does not make right. If we dare to act upon that falsehood, we do it at the expense of our happiness and our peace. We thank Thee for the voice within us that answers to the divine law, and that Thou hast given to us power to make moral distinctions. Grant to Thy servants in this great body the power to commend themselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God and the wisdom which will lead them in the discharge of their duties for the happiness of mankind. For Christ's sake. Amen.

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept an invitation extended by the Republic of France to the Government of the United States to be represented by delegates in an International Congress of Musical Science and History, to be held at Paris from June 1 to 10, 1914: Provided, That no appropriation shall be granted at any time for expenses of delegates or for other expenses incurred in connection with said commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

I do not ask to have the speech read, but I would like to have it printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator from New York will be complied with.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Speech delivered by Hon. George Turner, ex-United States Senator, before the Seattle Bar Association, at Seattle, April 29, 1914.]

THE PANAMA CANAL TOLLS AS AFFECTED BY TREATY OBLIGATIONS.

The repeal of the act of Congress exempting American coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls in passing through the Panama Canal is urged upon two grounds—first, that the exemption is a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty entered into with Great Britain, and, second, that it is to be condemned from an economic standpoint. The first is a question of power—that is, power in the sense of legal right—and the second a question of policy. I propose to discuss the first question only, as the second question enters to some extent into the domain of politics, and for that reason might not be considered appropriate for an occasion of this kind. But we all want to know what our treaty obligations are with other nations, and we all want to live up to them, honorably and to the fullest extent, no matter how onerous their provisions, and no subject could be more appropriate for the consideration of gentlemen of the bar. However much others may decry them, I know the lawyers of the Nation to be honorable and upright, possessed of a keen sense of justice, inflexible in the desire to see justice done, and still to-day, as they have ever been, the safest counselors of the people where the question is one between national honor and national interest. The tolls question has been put up to us so broadly and squarely in that guise that the learning of the Nation, trained to the construction of laws and treaties and contracts, can not, consistently with patriotic duty, shirk the task of considering it and passing upon it.

The provision of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which it is insisted binds the hands of the United States in the preference it may give to its own vessels in its own canal is the first of the rules adopted by the United States as the basis of the neutralization of the canal and found in article 3 of that treaty. That provision is as follows:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nations, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

The proponents of the repeal of tolls exemptions insist that the words "all nations" employed in this provision includes the United States, and therefore that it can make no discrimination in favor of itself or its citizens in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise imposed by it for the use of the canal. But there are six of these rules adopted by the United States for the neutralization of the canal, and the remaining rules read as follows:

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respect subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents, and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

If the United States is bound by the first of the rules adopted, it is equally bound by the others. The last five rules regulate the use of the canal and the conduct of belligerent nations toward it in time of war. The United States built the canal as a national enterprise, as an adjunct to its war power, wholly with its own money, and at a cost of more than $400,000,000. It was cognizant, of course, of the benefit it was conferring on the commerce of the world, but that any nation thought it was moved to the tremendous burden it was imposing on its own people wholly by that altruistic purpose is beyond rational belief. Great Britain least of all had reason to harbor such an idea. The first Hay-Pauncefote treaty failed by reason of amendments engrafted on it in the Senate of the United States. These amendments rejected the participation of any other nation in the protection of the neutrality of the canal and asserted specifically that nothing in the treaty should be construed as preventing any "measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order." The Senate also struck out from the declaration that the "canal shall be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to the vessels of war and of commerce of all nations" the words "in time of war as in time of peace." When Great Britain came to negotiate the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty she knew, therefore, that the United States proposed to construct the canal in aid of its war power, and that it rejected assistance from any quarter in building the canal or in protecting it after it was built. The new treaty accordingly omitted Great Britain as one of the two parties laying down the rules of neutralization, and the United States alone adopted and promulgated those rules; and the new treaty also omitted that clause of the former abortive treaty which provided for bringing the treaty to the notice of other powers and inviting them to adhere to it. The new treaty also omitted the provision of the former treaty that "no fortifications shall be erected commanding the canal or the waters adjacent." The new treaty also omitted the significant words "in time of war as in time of peace."

Now, in view of all this, is it possible to believe that the United States intended to bind itself to exercise no right of war in the canal when engaged in war with another nation—to not revictual and take in stores in the canal; to effect the transit of its war vessels through the canal without delay when perhaps the safety of its vessels required the asylum of Lake Gatun and the protection of the fortifications at either end; to not embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, and warlike materials in the canal except in case of accidental hindrance of transit; to limit the stay of its war vessels in the adjacent waters at either end of the canal and within the protection of the fortifications to a period no longer than 24 hours, and to permit, subject to these regulations, the war vessels of any other nation with which it may be at war to use and employ the canal equally with itself for the purpose of making war against it? Yet that is exactly what the United States has bound itself to do if, in promulgating its rules for the neutralization of the canal, it intended that it itself should be bound by those rules. The rules promulgated stand or fall together. If rule 1 includes the United States as one of the nations bound by its limitations, then so do rules 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6. If the latter rules do not include the United States, then manifestly rule 1 does not do so. Common sense and common knowledge alike forbid Great Britain to put forward the untenable proposition that the United States has disabled itself in the use that it may make of its own canal for its own purpose in time of war; but, considered from the standpoint of grammatical construction, the treaty disables the United States as much in time of war as in time of peace; and since it must be conceded that the language relied on does not disable it in time of war, the conclusion is inevitable that it does not disable it in time of peace. The true light in which to look at these rules is that the United States is making a grant to all nations of the free use of the canal on terms of entire equality, spoken as a grantor. It was not included in the term "all nations" for that reason. It was not making a grant to itself. The grant, moreover, was to "all nations observing these rules." Can it have intended that the United States was to hold an inquest on itself, find, perchance, that it had broken the rules, and then by its own decree forfeit its right to use and employ its own canal? Such a contention would, of course, be an absurdity, yet it is one to which the argument of those who question the power of the United States necessarily leads.

The language employed by the United States in declaring the rules of neutralization throw some light on their meaning. That language was:

The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th day of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say—

Then follow the six rules adopted. By recurring to the Constantinople convention we find that while it declared that the Suez Canal should always be free and open to vessels of war and of commerce without distinction of flag, there was no provision for equality of charges on traffic, the articles prescribing the manner of the use of the canal by belligerents in time of war was not to interfere with measures which the Sultan, or the Khedive in his name, might find it necessary to take for securing by their own forces the defense of Egypt or the defense of other possessions of the Sultan on the eastern coast of the Red Sea, and the treaty declared the sovereign rights of the Sultan and the rights and immunities of the Khedive in no way affected by its provisions. If, then, the neutralization of the Panama Canal was to be substantially that adopted by the convention of Constantinople for the Suez Canal, the United States did not limit itself either in war or peace in the use which it might make of the Panama Canal for its own purposes. It limited itself only in the matter of discrimination as between other nations.

The reference to the treaty of Constantinople does not, it must be admitted, incorporate the terms of that treaty into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and perhaps the reference to the former treaty in the later treaty does not furnish a conclusive guide to the meaning of specific provisions of the later treaty. But the reference must have been for some purpose, and that purpose was evidently to establish a principle, in the light of which the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty might be construed. In view of that fact the sedulous care with which the Constantinople convention guarded the sovereign rights of Turkey and Egypt, and the liberty it left to them in dealing with the Suez Canal, must be very persuasive when considering the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which it is contended impair the sovereignty of the United States and limit it in the free use it may make of the Panama Canal, both in war and in peace.

The strongest and most conclusive argument against the proposition that the term "all nations" used in rule 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty includes the United States is found in the language of the rule itself, and the inadmissible consequences to which it would lead if the United States were held to be included in and bound by its provisions.

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects—

And so forth.

Now, if by virtue of this provision the United States is powerless to exempt its merchant vessels from the payment of tolls, but must charge them to the same extent that it charges tolls to merchant vessels of other nations, then it is powerless to exempt its war vessels, and must charge them to the same extent as the war vessels of other nations. Vessels of commerce and of war are coupled together by the conjunction, and are each subject to the same identical regulations, and the equality of treatment required for both is to the end that there shall be no discrimination against "any such nation or its citizens or subjects." Any such result as that suggested arising from the language of rule 1 is, as I say, inadmissible. It leads to an absurdity. It is so much an absurdity that Great Britain has not pushed her claim to that extent and will not do so.

The United States must have contemplated some advantage over other nations as compensation for the great outlay of money, the risk of the enterprise, and the responsibility of safeguarding and defending the integrity of the work through all the coming ages. That compensation was the augmentation of its war power in the free use of the canal for war purposes. It must have been intended that there should be no limitation on that free use, and consequently that the United States was at liberty to pass its war vessels to and fro through the canal, freely and at pleasure, and without regard to the use of the canal by the war vessels of other nations. Yet the language of rule 1 of the treaty, unless limited by construction, has the effect of denying that right. Vessels of commerce and of war of all nations are inseparably connected in the language of the rule, and what is there designed to apply to one was designed to apply to the other. The necessary result is that the words "all nations" must be construed to mean all nations other than the United States. Reenforcing this result is the rule, before adverted to, that the United States, as the grantor, was not included in limitations imposed on its grantees, and in its true essence the rule 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was a grant by the United States to all the nations of the world. All nations observing the rules of neutralization were granted equality in the use of the canal.

Again, what was the equality granted? It was equality in the "conditions of charges of traffic." Conditions of traffic refer to the service rendered, its promptness and efficiency, and the impartiality of its rendition as between vessels of different nations seeking canal service. There is left to be considered only equity of charges. Since the United States can not charge itself for the passage through the canal of its own war vessels, because to do so would be to pay with one hand and receive with the other, the only equality in charges of traffic it could give to the war vessels of other nations would be to likewise pass them through the canal free. It is said, however, that the United States could accomplish the same result by charging against the annual upkeep of the canal and the interest charges a fair sum for the use of the canal by its own vessels, and thereby decrease the tonnage charges to be exacted from the vessels of foreign nations. But it did not agree to do anything of that kind. It promised only equality of charges. Those who insist on any such roundabout way of equalizing charges are guilty of the offense they charge against the advocates of the United States in endeavoring to bring about by construction a result not provided for by the treaty, and one evidently not contemplated by its makers, or it would have been provided for.

Those who would limit the United States by rule 1, article 3, of the treaty attempt to avoid the effect of the inclusion in that rule of equality of charges for war vessels by recurring to article 2 of the treaty, where it is provided that—

> Subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government—the United States—shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

Whatever this provision may mean it is expressly made subject to the other provisions of the treaty, including the provisions of rule 1, and we are not advanced in any degree in the ascertainment of the meaning of rule 1 by a reference to it. But if it means what is contended for it, namely, that the United States is to have and enjoy all the rights incident to its construction and ownership of the canal, and may therefore pass its warships through the canal free of tolls, then it proves too much.

If because it is the owner it may pass its war vessels free, then as owner it may for the same reason pass its merchant vessels free. It may, as owner, do what it pleases with the canal in the matter of the use that it may put it to for its own purposes. In this connection it should be remembered that in international law a nation is as much the owner of its vessels of commerce as of its vessels of war, and as the sovereign owner has the same claim to indulgence for them. So that if the provisions I am now considering has any effect at all, or, rather, if it has the effect, as claimed, of enabling the United States to employ the canal for its war vessels free of tolls and free of consideration in determining the amount to be realized annually for upkeeping, it is because that hypothesis is reached by a process of reasoning equally applicable to merchant vessels of the United States.

In considering the language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty there is an important rule of international law to be remembered. In matters involving their sovereign or property rights States are held bound by treaty stipulations to the exent only that they are clear and explicit. If the terms are vague and of doubtful import, the presumption is against the intention of the State to part with its sovereign or property rights. Hence, as the words "all nations" may be taken to mean all nations without exception or all nations other than the nation employing the words, the words "all nations" as employed in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty must be construed as meaning all nations other than the United States. When this rule of construction is fortified by the many other considerations to which I have adverted, the conclusion seems established beyond question that the United States did not, in and by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, part with any part of its sovereign rights to use and employ the Panama Canal as it pleased for its own purpose, both in peace and in war.

Great Britain's one strong argument is that the words "all nations" means all nations, and necessarily includes the United States. To this she brings the support of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty negotiated in 1850. That treaty has been much discussed in the United States. Our statesmen—and some of them very eminent statesmen—have taken the position that Great Britain abrogated it by violating it very soon after it was entered into. But for the purposes of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty it was assumed by both Governments to be still in force, and that it stood in the way of the construction of an Isthmian Canal by the United States alone, and the purpose of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was to rid the United States of its limiting force.

Much is made of this by those who advocate the British construction of the later treaty. Undoubtedly Great Britain gave up whatever advantage she might have derived from her contention that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was still in force and that it tied the hands of the United States, and to the extent that she stipulated for compensating advantages in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty she is now entitled to them. She now argues, and her advocates in this country argue, that article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was practically continued in force by the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which reads:

> The two Governments being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th of April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principles" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty, article 8 of which is here referred to, was entered into at a time when the activities of Great Britain in Central America were disquieting to the United States. Our statesmen, not then prepared to go to war with her in defense of the Monroe doctrine, were glad to limit her activities by treaty, and to that end to enter into reciprocal stipulations with her concerning the building of a canal to connect the two oceans and concerning the attempt of either to colonize or assume dominion over any part of Central America. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty provided, accordingly, that neither Government would ever obtain or maintain exclusive control over the canal then contemplated by the Nicaragua route, would not erect or maintain fortifications commanding the same, and would not occupy, fortify, or colonize, or assume or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America. The treaty then provided for extending the aid and encouragement of the two Governments to the building of the canal by such persons or company as might offer to construct the same, provided for extending the protection of the two Governments to the canal when built if conducted on terms of equality as between them, and made many provisions for securing the complete neutralization of the canal in time of war. None of these provisions bear on the present controversy. They all relate to a specific canal then in contemplation to be built by the Nicaragua route. But article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty declared that the two Governments, desirous of establishing a general principle, would extend their protection to any other practicable canal or railway across the Isthmus, and concluded:

> In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

It is this last provision that is referred to in the preamble to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and which has been treated as if it was thereby incorporated in that treaty. But manifestly that reference can have no such effect. The two Governments were stipulating in the earlier treaty about a canal or railway to be built by a third party, to which they were each to extend protection on condition of equality of treatment between them, and on condition of like equality of treatment to be extended to all other nations which might be willing to grant to the canal or railway such protection as the United States and Great Britain had engaged to afford. After the adoption of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty there was no condition left to which these stipulations could apply. The building of a canal by some third party was gone. The joint regulation of traffic charges by the two Governments was gone. Great Britain was eliminated from any control in the canal or any responsibility for its defense. The provision for extending the use of the canal on equal terms to other nations willing to grant such protection to the canal as the United States and Great Britain had engaged to afford was likewise gone, because the United States did not ask and would not permit any other nation than itself to have any part in the protection of the canal. Nothing was left of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty except an intangible general principle, and hence it is wholly inadmissible to attempt to measure the rights and obligations of the United States by the language of that article. Nor does the Hay-Pauncefote treaty attempt to do so. It merely preserves the "general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention." What was that general principle? Merely that the canal should be a world canal, from which no nation might be debarred by the interest or caprice of the owner, and, generally, that the use to be accorded the nations should be on terms of equality. The reference to the general principle of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was for the purpose of carrying that idea forward into the new treaty in order that the stipulations of the latter might be interpreted in the light which it afforded. Suppose a canal had been built by Nicaragua while the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was in force. Could it have been contended that Nicaragua would have been bound and limited by that treaty in the use it might have made of the canal for its own purposes? Manifestly not.

The extent, then, to which the United States as the sole owner might enjoy the advantages of ownership was no more touched by the reference to article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty than Nicaragua would have been touched by the substantive provisions of that article itself if it had constructed the canal while that article was still in force. The general principle of neutralization established by that article was equal treatment of all nations by the owner, not equal treatment of all nations with the owner. To that extent, and to that extent alone, was the principle of neutralization continued in force by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. There can be no objection to the stipulations made by the United States in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty being considered in the light of that general principle. But that principle throws no adverse light on the contention of the United States that its rights as the owner of the canal are separate and apart from the rights which it has stipulated other nations might have and enjoy in the canal.

One other argument is to be noticed, and I shall do it very briefly. The Bard amendment to the treaty, affirming the right of the United States to give preference to its coastwise shipping, was voted down in the Senate, and that is held up as a construction of the treaty by the United States Senate contrary to the claim of power now put forward for the United States by those who oppose repeal or tolls exemption. It has now been established beyond cavil or question by the testimony of Senators who participated in the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that the Bard amendment was voted down because of the conviction of Senators that the treaty needed no amendment to effectuate the purpose intended, and because the Foreign Relations Committee, taking that view, urged Senators to not burden the treaty with useless amendments.

There is much in the diplomatic correspondence accompanying the formulation of the two Hay-Pauncefote treaties which throws light on the meaning of the treaty as finally ratified, and it all makes for the interpretation of the treaty which I have endeavored to indicate. But I have not thought it best to enter on a discussion of that feature because of the length to which this paper has already grown. Moreover, our training in the common law is in the direction of confining our explorations into the meaning of written contracts to the four corners of the instrument construed, with some slight liberty to look at the history of the transaction as an aid in construction. That method, with which we are all familiar, leaves little room, in my judgment, for doubt as to the meaning of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. That treaty leaves the United States, as the owner of the Panama Canal, complete liberty in the use to which it may see fit to put the canal for its own purposes, subject, of course, and always, to the equality of treatment of other nations as between themselves, to which the treaty pledges the United States.

FORT M'HENRY MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I renew the request I made on yesterday and ask for unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House bill 12806. I stated my reasons at that time for making the request. It is to grant to the city of Baltimore the use of old Fort McHenry and the grounds of the reservation connected with it. The authorities there are anxious to have the matter acted upon speedily, if it is going to be acted upon at all, because they intend to celebrate the occasion of the writing of the Star-Spangled Banner and the battle that was fought there; that celebration is to be had in a short time, and they want to expend whatever money is necessary to put the grounds in order. The reservation is now owned by the Government, and the title will remain in the Government. This bill is simply to allow the use of the reservation for the purpose of keeping it up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 12806) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant the use of the Fort McHenry Military Reservation, in the State of Maryland, to the mayor and city council of Baltimore, a municipal corporation of the State of Maryland, making certain provisions in connection therewith, providing access to and from the site of the new immigration station heretofore set aside, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments. The first amendment was in section 1, page 2, line 1, after the word "in," to strike out "sections" and insert "section"; and in line 2, after the word "three," to strike out "and four"; and in the same line, after the word "hereof," to insert "and that part now in use by the Department of Commerce for a light and fog-signal station under revocable license from the War Department, with the maintenance of the electric lines thereto," so as to make the section read:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant permission to the mayor and city council of Baltimore, a municipal corporation of the State of Maryland, to occupy and use the military reservation of Fort McHenry, Md., except that part mentioned in section 3 hereof and that part now in use by the Department of Commerce for a light and fog-signal station under revocable license from the War Department, with the maintenance of the electric lines thereto, as a public park upon the agreement of said corporation to repair, maintain, and protect the reservation and the public property thereof during the continuance of its occupancy at its own expense: Provided, That the said permission shall be subject to such conditions, restrictions, rules, and regulations as the Secretary of War may from time to time prescribe: Provided further, That the Secretary of War may terminate the said permission to use said grounds whenever and at such time as he may deem it expedient to do so.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 12, to strike out section 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. That permission is hereby granted the Secretary of Commerce to use a portion of said military reservation not less than 20 feet square for maintaining a light and fog signal to mark the Fort McHenry Channel, and to maintain poles as may be necessary for carrying wires to transmit electric current to operate the fog signal.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, after talking the matter over with Senators, I desire to change the notice I have given as to the time at which I shall address the Senate on the Panama Canal tolls bill from Thursday next to Wednesday next, immediately after the remarks of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I think it but fair that I should give notice to Senators who desire to speak on the Panama Canal tolls bill that, immediately upon the conclusion of the speeches that are to be made on the 27th of May, a vote will be asked, and that from that time forward there will be a vote requested at any time when Senators are not addressing the Senate on that subject. I might repeat what I said on yesterday, that we are prepared to hold night sessions, and there is a desire on the part of Members on both sides that we hold night sessions, if necessary, to the end that all Senators who desire to speak may be heard between now and the 27th of May.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests to the Senator from Indiana that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] has given notice of his intention to speak on the bill on May 28.

Mr. KERN. I do not understand, Mr. President, that any Senator by giving notice of his intention to speak on the 4th of July can bind the Senate to wait on him. Of course, these notices should be respected within bounds. I did not know the Senator from Pennsylvania had given notice to speak on the 28th of May. I hope he may be able——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Regular order!

Mr. KERN. To set his time forward a little.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. KERN. But if not, then we shall ask, of course, to take the vote at the conclusion of his remarks.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, referring to the remarks of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], I will state that, while I have given notice of my desire to speak on May 28, if there is any evidence prior to that time that this debate can be brought to an earlier conclusion, my notice shall not stand in the way. I will make my remarks before the bill is disposed of.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask that the Panama Canal tolls bill may be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, some time ago I taxed the patience of the Senate by rather extended remarks upon the duty of the United States in regard to tolls upon the Panama Canal; and what I have to say now upon that subject is rather in the way of reply to arguments which have been made, views which have been expressed, and opinions which have been made manifest by various Senators in the course of the long debate which has intervened.

I wish, before proceeding, to express my very great satisfaction with the character of the debate in this Chamber upon this subject. The excitement and fervor of a false patriotism, the insolence and rancor which ill befit the consideration of a serious international subject by a great people, but which have been injected into the popular discussion of this question in some quarters, have found but little response among the Members of the Senate of the United States. The question which is before us has been debated with a sense of responsibility and dignity. Senators have argued the question as lawyers and legislators upon its merits. I address myself to a reply to some of the arguments which have been made with a sense of serene satisfaction in dealing with a question which rests in the minds of my colleagues upon considerations of right reason and just regard for national obligations and national rights.

Let me try, sir, to state the question; and to state the question I must state the situation as it is presented. The bill which is before the Senate proposes to repeal certain clauses of the Panama Canal act passed August 24, 1912. That act was designed to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the canal, and it conferred authority upon the President in respect of establishing tolls for the use of the canal and imposed certain limitations upon him. Section 5 of the act authorized the President to prescribe and from time to time change the tolls; it provided "that no tolls, when prescribed as above, shall be changed" without six months' notice; it provided that no tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States. Further, the act provided:

> When based upon net registered tonnage for ships of commerce, the tolls shall not exceed $1.25 per net registered ton, nor be less, other than for vessels of the United States and its citizens, than the estimated proportionate cost of the actual maintenance and operation of the canal.

Then it goes on to say:

> Nor be less than the equivalent of 75 cents per net registered ton.

So that the President is authorized to impose tolls not exceeding $1.25 per net registered ton, except for vessels of the United States and its citizens, and not less than 75 cents per net registered ton, and is prohibited from imposing any tolls upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States. He is required to impose tolls of at least 75 cents per net registered ton upon all foreign vessels. He is authorized to impose no tolls upon any American vessel, and is required to impose no tolls upon American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade.

The President has issued a proclamation imposing tolls of $1.20 per net registered ton upon vessels loaded, a smaller amount upon vessels in ballast, and no tolls upon vessels engaged in American coastwise trade. A question has been raised by Great Britain as to the conformity of that action with a treaty made between the United States and Great Britain in 1901, known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It is claimed that that treaty requires that there shall be no discrimination between the tolls imposed upon foreign vessels and the tolls imposed upon vessels owned by citizens of the United States.

The first thing which we naturally do when such a question is presented is to inquire: What is our title? What are the rights that we have?

Until very recently the Isthmus of Panama was not the property of the United States, and we had no rights there except certain rights derived from an old treaty with New Granada, made in 1846, by which New Granada gave to the United States certain privileges in any lines of communication which might be constructed, either railroad or canal, but gave the United States no right to construct a canal and no property rights whatever.

How did we get the canal upon which we are proposing to exact tolls? It was under a treaty made with the Republic of Panama, sometimes called the Hay-Bunau-Varilla treaty. It was signed at Washington on the 18th of November, 1903. Under that treaty with Panama, the owner of the Isthmus, by article 2—> granted to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of a zone of land and land under water, for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of said canal, of the width of 10 miles—

And so forth.

By article 3 it granted to the United States all the rights, power, and authority which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory, to the exclusion of Panama.

In article 18 it provided that—

> The canal, when constructed, and the entrances thereto, shall be neutral in perpetuity and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of article 3 of, and in conformity with all the stipulations of, the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901.

That treaty with Panama is the basis of our rights. That treaty lies at the foundation of any question that can be raised as to what we do with the canal which we are constructing, because it is by that treaty, and by that treaty alone, that we get our title. By that treaty the grant of property and jurisdiction upon which we have proceeded, upon which we hold the canal, is subject to the provision that the canal, when constructed, and the entrances thereto, shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by the treaty between the United States and Great Britain of November 18, 1901.

So the treaty with Great Britain which is referred to here is carried into our title as a limitation upon it.

Let us turn to the treaty with Great Britain which is referred to by Panama in this grant. That treaty was signed at Washington November 18, 1901. It recites that a convention was considered expedient by the United States and Great Britain—> to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th of April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty * * * without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention.

It proceeds to say:

> The canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

It then proceeds with article 3:

> The United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:
> 1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Rule 1, which I have just read, is the section 1 of article 3 of the treaty with Great Britain which is specified in the eighteenth article of our grant of title from Panama as being especially and peculiarly and signally incumbent upon us to observe. "The canal," says the treaty with Panama, "when constructed, and the entrances thereto, shall be neutral in perpetuity and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of article 3" of the treaty with Great Britain.

I have now read section 1 of article 3. There follows, then, in article 3, a series of provisions relating specifically to the kind of neutrality which shall be imposed. They are in substance these:

First. There shall be no blockade of the canal or act of war in it or in its terminal waters.

Second. There shall be no delay in transit in time of war by a belligerent.

Third. No troops or supplies in time of war shall be landed or taken on by vessels in the canal.

Fourth. Belligerent ships shall remain but 24 hours in the terminal waters.

Fifth. A war vessel of one belligerent shall not leave the canal within 24 hours after the vessel of another belligerent has left.

All of those are covered by the general provision of the article in the treaty with Panama in these words:

And in conformity with all the stipulations of the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain.

Under these provisions, first, of the Panama Treaty, and, second, of the treaty with Great Britain, which is incorporated into the grant of title to us, one question, and one question only, is raised. That is, What is the measure of the tolls that we are at liberty to charge a ship belonging to a British or German or French citizen passing through the canal?

It is quite natural to say that this is a question of the exemption of our ships. It is not a question of the exemption of our ships. No one doubts our right to pass our ships through the canal free, or for any tolls that we choose to impose and that they are able and willing to pay. The question is whether we are bound to take our treatment of the ships belonging to American citizens as the measure of the treatment that we accord to ships belonging to the citizens of other countries.

We have the canal at the Sault, through which pass a greater tonnage and a greater traffic than we can anticipate for the Panama Canal for generations. We charge no tolls to American vessels—that is to say, vessels owned by American citizens—passing through the canal at the Sault, and by treaty we grant to the citizens of Great Britain and Canada the same treatment we accord to our own citizens and their vessels. We have agreed that the measure that we mete to our own citizens shall be the measure we mete to the citizens of Canada. There is no question there about our rights with our own, and there is no question here about our rights with our own.

Nor, Mr. President, is there any question here about the absolute and complete control of the canal by the United States. There is no question, there can be no question, about it. Political control, military control, administrative control, all are ours. The only question is, What standard are we bound to apply in making a charge to the citizens of another country for the use of the canal for passing the ships through? The treaty itself is quite clear. It says:

Subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

We occupy a variety of relations to that business. We are the practical sovereign of the territory, and we have all the rights of sovereignty in respect of the territory. We are the owner of the canal just as a canal company would be the owner if it had constructed it under a charter, just as the Panama Railroad Co. owns the Panama Railroad. We will be the owner of many ships that pass through the canal. We owe protection to many citizens of the United States who will own ships that pass through the canal.

Those four different relations of the United States to this business stand each by itself, and the rights and obligations of each may be clearly ascertained and stated. Sometimes a dual quality will effect an extinguishment of rights and obligations, as, for instance, if the United States as the owner of a ship sends its ship through a canal and is also the owner of the canal, the obligation as owner of the ship to the owner of the canal will be offset; but for any clear conception of what the rights and obligations are, we must consider each character in which the United States stands by itself.

It would be impossible to state more distinctly the precise relation that we have in regard to the control of the canal than Mr. Choate stated it in his letter of October 2, 1901, to Mr. Hay, when the treaty was agreed upon. He said:

I am sure that in this whole matter, since the receipt by him of your new draft, Lord Lansdowne has been most considerate and more than generous. He has shown an earnest desire to bring to an amicable settlement, honorable alike to both parties, this long and important controversy between the two nations. In substance, he abrogates the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, gives us an American canal—ours to build as and where we like, to own, control, and govern—on the sole condition of its being always neutral and free for the passage of the ships of all nations on equal terms, except that if we get into a war with any nation we can shut its ships out and take care of ourselves.

Nor is there any question here about ships owned by the United States. There is much confusion in discussing this subject arising from the use of the term "ships of the United States" or "American ships." The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] called attention to that the other day very pointedly. There are ships owned by the United States. When the United States acquires the other character of owner of the canal, of course there can be no question about tolls on those ships, but ships owned by citizens of the United States are quite a different thing. Citizens of the United States are not the United States. They are separate and distinct entities. We tax them, we regulate them, we fine them, we impose charges upon them. If they acquire property from the United States, they pay for it, and if the United States acquires property from them, it pays for it. They are entirely separate and distinct individuals from the United States. The question here is about charges that shall be made by the United States to two different classes of separate and distinct individuals, both classes being the owners of ships, one class being citizens of the United States and the other class being citizens of some other country.

The words of this Hay-Pauncefote treaty, Mr. President, are framed to cover both a canal company and the United States. Observe that article 2 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty says:

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy—

And so forth.

Now, there is a variety of contingencies to which the words of this treaty are addressed, and you must construe the words as they would apply to a canal company in which the Government of the United States had become a stockholder, as it is of the Panama Railroad Co. to-day, or the bonds of which the United States has guaranteed, as it guaranteed the bonds of the Pacific railroad companies. The fact that the United States has stepped in and itself taken the character of a canal company makes no difference whatever in the meaning and force and interpretation and application of these words. The treaty remains the same, the meaning of it the same. The acquisition of additional and different rights by the United States may arise merely to modify the effect of the application of the treaty.

Nor, Mr. President, is there any question here about the right of the United States to subsidize its own ships. That is as clear and as unquestionable as its right to appropriate money to put up a public building in the city of Washington. It does not rest upon our assertion, for Sir Edward Grey, the secretary of state for foreign affairs of Great Britain, in his memorandum handed to our Secretary of State on the 9th of December, 1912, says, commenting upon President Taft's memorandum accompanying the signature to the bill—

The President argues upon the assumption that it is the intention of His Majesty's Government to place upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty an interpretation which would prevent the United States from granting subsidies to their own shipping passing through the canal, and which would place them at a disadvantage as compared with other nations. This is not the case. His Majesty's Government regard equality of all nations as the fundamental principle underlying the treaty of 1901 in the same way that it was the basis of the Suez Canal convention of 1888, and they do not seek to deprive the United States of any liberty which is open either to themselves or to any other nation; nor do they find either in the letter or in the spirit of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty any surrender by either of the contracting powers of the right to encourage its shipping or its commerce by such subsidies as it may deem expedient.

I take the line to be at the point where title to the money vests in the United States. If the construction which I feel forced to give to this treaty is a sound one, we are not at liberty to produce the result of a subsidy to American ships by relieving them of tolls which we impose upon other ships. We are not at liberty to produce the effect of a subsidy in that way; but the instant that the money paid for tolls becomes the property of the United States, becomes a part of the general fund of the United States, the United States has absolute and uncontrollable authority in the disposition of that money. All lawyers are familiar with the distinction between accomplishing an unlawful object in a lawful way and accomplishing a lawful object in an unlawful way. To subsidize American ships is lawful. However we may differ about the policy, we have the power; we have the right; but if the construction I give to this treaty is the correct one, we have excluded ourselves by solemn covenant from accomplishing that lawful result in this particular way; and if it be true that we have excluded ourselves from doing it in this particular way, it is no answer to say the same result could be accomplished in another way. In my view it is no concern of ours why Great Britain chooses to insist upon our keeping the covenant and not to produce the effect of a subsidy in that particular way. If this construction of the treaty is right, she has a right to say, "You shall not do that thing in that way"; and if we made the covenant, it is none of our affairs why she chooses to say it.

Now, upon what conflict of reasons rests the decision of the question whether we are bound to regulate the tolls upon foreign shipping by the tolls on American shipping? The underlying question has been stated quite frequently as being whether the words "all nations" in rule 1 of article 3 include the United States or not. Rule 1 reads:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality.

I say that very often the subject has been discussed upon the assumption that the answer to the practical question raised depends upon whether the term "all nations" includes the United States or not. That does not get quite to the foundation upon which the reasoning should rest. The fundamental question is, What kind of equality did the makers of this treaty intend? Says the treaty:

The canal shall be free and open to all vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality.

When a French or a German ship sails into that canal and has imposed upon it a toll, and says "this toll is unequal because the vessel that passed here immediately before me was allowed to go with a lower rate of toll," can that be said, if the vessel before was an American ship——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The ship of an American citizen.

Mr. ROOT. The ship of an American citizen; or can it be said only if it was the ship of some foreign power? What is the "entire equality" contemplated by rule 1 of article 3 of this treaty? Is it entire so that it assures equality in comparison with all ships engaged in the same trade similarly situated, the same kind of trade, or is it partial, so as to be equality in comparison only with certain ships engaged in the same kind of trade and not applying to other ships engaged in the same kind of trade, to wit, not applying to ships which are owned by American citizens? The rule proceeds:

So that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

Is the kind of equality that is assured such that there will be no discrimination or that there will be no discrimination except against the ships of other nations and in favor of ships belonging to American citizens?

Now, let us examine the question in the light of the circumstances which surrounded the making of this treaty and the conditions under which it was made. Treaties can not be usefully interpreted with the microscope and the dissecting knife as if they were criminal indictments. Treaties are steps in the life and the development of great nations. Public policies enter into them; public policies certified by public documents and authentic expressions of public officers. Long contests between the representatives of nations enter into the choice and arrangement of the words of a treaty. If you would be sure of what a treaty means, if there be any doubt, if there are two interpretations suggested, learn out of what conflicting public policies the words of the treaty had their birth; what arguments were made for one side or the other, what concessions were yielded in the making of a treaty. Always, with rare exceptions, the birth and development of every important clause may be traced by the authentic records of the negotiators and of the countries which are reconciling their differences. So it is the universal rule in all diplomatic correspondence regarding international rights, in all courts of arbitration, that far more weight is given to records of negotiations, to the expressions of the negotiators, to the history of the provisions than is customary in regard to private contracts or criminal indictments.

This question as to the kind of equality that the makers of this treaty intended to give divides itself very clearly and distinctly into a question between two perfectly well-known expedients of treaty making; one is the favored-nation provision, with which we are all very familiar in commercial treaties, and the other is the provision according to citizens of another country rights measured by the rights of the nationals or citizens of the contracting country. The most-favored-nation provision has its most common expression in the provision regarding tariff duties, a provision that no higher duties shall be charged upon goods imported from one foreign country than upon goods imported from other foreign countries. That is the common "most-favored-nation clause."

The other has its probably most common provision in the laws relating to the treatment of vessels in the ports of a contracting country, assuring to them that no higher tolls or charges, harbor dues or light dues, or dues of that description shall be charged against them than against the vessels of the country in which the port is situated.

This question here is between those two. I can not better illustrate the two kinds I have mentioned than by referring to the treaty with the Argentine Republic in 1853, a typical treaty of friendship, commerce, and navigation. Before I read from it I will state what is an almost universal custom among civilized nations in regard to the use of these two standards of comparison for the purpose of assuring one or another kind of equality. It is the practically universal custom, where the citizens of another country bear the same relation to a particular anticipated transaction or course of business that the citizens of the contracting country bear, in treaties of peace and friendship and amity, to accord to citizens of the other country equality measured by the treatment of the citizens of the contracting country; and, in general, it is only when the citizens of the other country bear a different relation to the anticipated transaction or course of business that recourse is had to the favored-nation clause, as where the people of one country are exporting goods and the people of the contracting country are importing goods. Plainly you can not give to the exporter the same treatment you give to the importer; they are two different classes.

Now, let me illustrate that by referring to the Argentine treaty:

ART. 2. There shall be between all the territories of the United States and all the territories of the Argentine Confederation a reciprocal freedom of commerce. The citizens of the two countries, respectively, shall have liberty, freely and securely, to come with their ships and cargoes to all places, ports, and rivers in the territories of either, to which other foreigners, or the ships or cargoes of any other foreign nation or State, are, or may be, permitted to come.

* * * * * * *

ART. 3. The two high contracting parties agree that any favor, exemption, privilege, or immunity whatever, in matters of commerce and navigation, which either of them has actually granted, or may hereafter grant, to the citizens or subjects of any other government, nation, or state, shall extend, in identity of cases and circumstances, to the citizens of the other contracting party.

* * * * * * *

ART. 4. No higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the territories of either of the two contracting parties of any article of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the territories of the other contracting party than are, or shall be, payable on the like article of any other foreign country.

Those are favored-nation clauses. Article 5 provides:

No other or higher duties or charges, on account of tonnage, light, or harbor dues, pilotage, salvage in case of average or shipwreck, or any other local charges, shall be imposed in the ports of the two contracting parties on the vessels of the other than those payable in the same ports on its own vessels.

There is the higher type of equality, because the ships coming into an American port have the same relation to that port whether they belong to an Argentine citizen or to an American.

ARTICLE 6.

The same duties shall be paid, and the same drawbacks and bounties allowed, upon the importation or exportation of any article into or from the territories of the United States or into or from the territories of the Argentine Confederation whether such importation or exportation be made in vessels of the United States or in vessels of the Argentine Confederation.

ARTICLE 8.

All merchants, commanders of ships, and others, citizens of the United States, shall have full liberty in all the territories of the Argentine Confederation to manage their own affairs themselves or to commit them to the management of whomsoever they please as broker, factor, agent, or interpreter; nor shall they be obliged to employ any other persons in those capacities than those employed by citizens of the Argentine Confederation. * * *

ARTICLE 9.

In whatever relates to the police of the ports, the lading and unlading of ships, the safety of the merchandise, goods and effects, and to the acquiring and disposing of property of every sort and denomination, either by sale, donation, exchange, testament, or in any other manner whatsoever, as also to the administration of justice, the citizens of the two contracting parties shall reciprocally enjoy the same privileges, liberties, and rights as native citizens.

And so on through a great number of other provisions. In brief, a careful examination shows this to be a fact: That it is the universal rule, with rare exceptions, that wherever the rights of the citizens of a contracting country can be made the standard of equality for the citizens of another country they are made so, and that recourse is not had to the most-favored-nation clause, except where that higher degree of equality is impossible because the citizens of the two countries occupy different relations to the business that is contemplated.

So we have the question between these two kinds of equality clearly drawn and resting upon long experience of nations, a subject fully understood by the negotiators of this treaty upon both sides.

We know now that the negotiators of this treaty, the men who made it, all understood that the larger equality was intended by its terms. Of course, what the negotiator of a treaty says can not be effective to overthrow a treaty; but I think we must all start, in considering this question, with the assumption that the words are capable of two constructions. I think no one can deny that, in view of the differences of opinion which have been expressed here regarding their meaning. So here are words capable of two constructions, a broad construction and a narrow construction, but the fact that all the makers of the treaty intended that the words they used should have the larger effect is certainly very persuasive toward the conclusion that those words should receive the larger effect. Not only the American negotiators but the British negotiators as well so understood it. Whenever we seek to impose upon these words a narrower construction for our own interests than the makers of the treaty understood them to have, we should remember the fundamental rule of morals that a promisor is bound to keep a promise in the sense in which he had reason to believe the promisee understood it was made.

Let us look at the understanding of the negotiators. Mr. Choate writes this in a letter to Hon. Henry White, dated April 14, 1914:

As I telegraphed to you last night, on receipt of your telegram of yesterday I wrote to the chairman of the committee, Senator O'GORMAN, inclosing to him, by the express permission of the Secretary of State, a copy of my letters to Secretary Hay between August 3, and October 12, 1901, the same that you have. To my mind they establish beyond question the intent of the parties engaged in the negotiation, that the treaty should mean exactly what it says, and excludes the possibility of any exemption of any kind of vessels of the United States. Equality between Great Britain and the United States is the constant theme, and especially in my last letter of October 2, 1901, where I speak of Lord Lansdowne's part in the matter, and say "He has shown an earnest desire to bring to an amicable settlement, honorable alike to both parties, this long and important controversy between the two nations. In substance, he abrogates the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, gives us an American canal, ours to build as and where we like, to own, control, and govern, on the sole condition of its being always neutral and free for the passage of the ships of all nations on equal terms, except that if we get into a war with any nation we can shut its ships out and take care of ourselves."

This was the summing up of our whole two months' negotiation.

Mr. Henry White's understanding of it is shown in the testimony before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals of April 14, 1914. He says:

During the entire period of those negotiations and in all of my conversations with Lord Salisbury or with anyone else on either side of the Atlantic I never heard the subject of our coastwise traffic mentioned. It was always assumed by those carrying on the negotiations—it certainly was by me in my interview with Lord Salisbury—that he meant that our ships should be considered, or rather that the United States should be considered, as included in the term "all nations."

Senator SIMMONS. And our coastwise ships?

Mr. WHITE. All ships.

The CHAIRMAN. You are stating now what your understanding is, not what the language was?

Mr. WHITE. No; my understanding. The language was "ships of all nations on equal terms." That was the language used by Lord Salisbury, which I cabled the same day to Mr. Hay. Mr. Hay had asked Lord Salisbury to remove such obstacles in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as stood in the way of our building the canal, and his reply was that he had no doubt these obstacles would eventually be removed, provided the ships of all nations should go through the canal on equal terms.

Senator SIMMONS. Do I understand you to say you had suggestions from any direction that our coastwise ships were to be treated differently?

Mr. WHITE. Never from beginning to end.

We know from many sources what Mr. Hay's views were. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] has read to you a statement of them, authentic, made about the time of the treaty, at the time the treaty with Panama was under consideration. Here is what Mr. Hay says:

"All means all. The treaty was not so long that we could not have made room for the word 'other' if we had understood that it belonged there. 'All nations' means all nations, and the United States is certainly a nation."

"That was the understanding between yourself and Lord Pauncefote when you and he made the treaty?" I pursued.

"It certainly was," he replied. "It was the understanding of both Governments, and I have no doubt that the Senate realized that in ratifying the second treaty without such an amendment it was committing us to the principle of giving all friendly nations equal privileges in the canal with ourselves. That is our golden rule."

I can not pass from this subject without also calling attention to the language used by President Roosevelt in his message to the Senate upon which the Panama treaty was ratified. President Roosevelt said in this message of January 4, 1904, laying before Congress the Panama treaty:

The proper position for the United States to assume in reference to this canal, and therefore to the Governments of the Isthmus, had been clearly set forth by Secretary Cass in 1858. In my annual message I have already quoted what Secretary Cass said; but I repeat the quotation here, because the principle it states is fundamental:

"While the rights of sovereignty of the States occupying this region (Central America) should always be respected, we shall expect that these rights be exercised in a spirit befitting the occasion and the wants and circumstances that have arisen. Sovereignty has its duties as well as its rights, and none of these local Governments, even if administered with more regard to the just demands of other nations than they have been, would be permitted in a spirit of eastern isolation to close the gates of intercourse on the great highways of the world and justify the act by the pretension that these avenues of trade and travel belong to them and that they choose to shut them, or, what is almost equivalent, to encumber them with such unjust relations as would prevent their general use."

The principle thus enunciated by Secretary Cass was sound then and it is sound now. The United States has taken the position that no other Government is to build the canal. In 1889, when France proposed to come to the aid of the French Panama Co. by guaranteeing their bonds, the Senate of the United States in executive session, with only some three votes dissenting, passed a resolution, as follows:

"That the Government of the United States will look with serious concern and disapproval upon any connection of any European Government with the construction or control of any ship canal across the Isthmus of Darien or across Central America, and must regard any such connection or control as injurious to the just rights and interests of the United States and as a menace to their welfare."

Under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty it was explicitly provided that the United States should control, police, and protect the canal which was to be built, keeping it open for the vessels of all nations on equal terms. The United States thus assumed the position of guarantor of the canal and of its peaceful use by all the world.

Who were these men? Certainly, anyone who finds in this treaty now a meaning different from that which they thought their words carried should consider many times the steps by which he reaches his conclusion.

Mr. Choate, the head of the American bar, clear, able, with penetrating intelligence, with vast experience in the use of words and the construction of treaties, of statutes, of contracts, unquestionable in the virile strength and loyalty of his Americanism. When he thought that the words he used had a particular meaning, we may well think twice before we say that they have not that meaning.

Henry White, one of the few diplomats trained from their youth up in the American service.

John Hay, the pride of our generation in American diplomacy. John Hay, that sensitive soul that could produce the American types of the Pike County ballads, and the charm, the felicity of whose phrases makes them jewels in the history of American literature. John Hay, who received the spirit, the motive, the characteristics of his Americanism as the young secretary and the confidential and intimate friend of Lincoln.

Theodore Roosevelt, with his swift, incisive mind and his high courage.

All these—the chargé d'affaires who opened the negotiations with Lord Salisbury, the ambassador who carried on the negotiations, the Secretary of State who supervised and authorized the negotiations, the President who authorized, as one of the first acts of his Presidency, the signature to the treaty and laid it before the Senate—all these understood that they were making a treaty with the largest equality, and with no trifling, narrow, "favored nation" provision.

Indeed, sir, the "favored-nation" clause is of but little value. If the standard of equality be not the standard of the treatment of ships owned by American citizens, and be nothing but the "favored-nation" standard—that is, equality as between foreigners—it is of but very little value. That equality would be practically compelled by the usages of civilization without any treaty at all. No nation could ever maintain a practice of charging for the use of a canal connecting two oceans a different rate of tolls as against Germans or French or English or Italians. It never has been done anywhere in the world. It never will be done unless civilization goes back from the level which it has now reached. But the other, the larger, equality is of value; for the treatment of the citizens of the country which owns the canal, the treatment they will submit to, the treatment that it is safe to accord to them before election, is a safe and a sound, substantial guaranty of the treatment the citizens of other nations will receive; so that is of value.

Mr. President, of course what these negotiators all thought they were doing by the use of these words is not conclusive. It is persuasive, but not conclusive. Let us ascertain why they thought so, if we can.

The first reason why it seems to me they could not possibly have meant anything else than they say they meant is that for three-quarters of a century the United States had been declaring to the world that she sought to procure the making of the canal across the Isthmus as a public-service work, a public calling, a public utility, with all the nations the public to be served. I say, for three-quarters of a century the United States had been making that declaration as to its relation to this work; yes, always without one varying note, until we got the title and control of the canal; and then for the first time is heard the demand that American owners of ships shall receive better treatment in tolls than the ships of other owners.

Now, let me call attention to some of the declarations. You have read them all; they are not new in this debate; but I beg you to consider them as a whole and consider the position in which we stand with reference to them as a series unbroken and unvarying. In 1826 Henry Clay, Secretary of State, said:

If a canal across the Isthmus be opened so as to admit of the passage of sea vessels from ocean to ocean, the benefits of it ought not to be exclusively appropriated to any one nation, but should be extended to all parts of the globe upon the payment of a just compensation or reasonable tolls.

A resolution of the Senate in 1835:

The construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and of securing forever by such stipulations the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all such nations—

Is recommended as the subject of negotiation, "free and equal right to all such nations."

Resolution of the House in 1839:

For the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of effecting a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus and of securing forever, by suitable treaty stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all nations—

Is recommended.

In the overtures by the United States to Great Britain which resulted in the making of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty Mr. Rives to Lord Palmerston in 1849 said:

That the United States sought no exclusive privilege or preferential right of any kind in regard to the proposed communication, and their sincere wish, if it should be found practical, was to see it dedicated to the common use of all nations on the most liberal terms and a footing of perfect equality for all.

That the United States would not if they could obtain any exclusive right or privilege in a great highway which naturally belongs to all mankind.

In the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1859, article 6:

And the contracting parties—

The United States and Great Britain—

likewise agree that each shall enter into treaty stipulations with such of the Central American States as they may deem advisable, for the purpose of more effectually carrying out the great design of this convention, namely, that of constructing and maintaining the said canal as a ship communication between the two oceans for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all, and of protecting the same.

In 1858 Secretary Cass, in the utterance which I have just read from the January 4, 1904, message of President Roosevelt.

In 1881 Secretary Blaine. Mr. President, this utterance is of special significance, because it was the first serious overture to Great Britain to bring about that abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and the substitution of a canal under the sole auspices of the United States, which has been realized in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Mr. Blaine on the 24th of June, 1881, writes to the American minister to open negotiations with Great Britain for obviating the objections in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. He says:

There has never been the slightest doubt on the part of the United States as to the purpose or extent of the obligation then assumed—

That is, in the Colombian treaty of 1846—

by which it became surety alike for the free transit of the world's commerce over whatever land way or waterway might be opened from sea to sea, and for the protection of the territorial rights of Colombia from aggression or interference of any kind.

He then proceeds to say that the President deems it due to frankness to suggest a new arrangement with Great Britain. He says:

Nor, in time of peace, does the United States seek to have any exclusive privileges accorded to American ships in respect to precedence or tolls through an interoceanic canal any more than it has sought like privileges for American goods in transit over the Panama Railway, under the exclusive control of an American corporation. The extent of the privileges of American citizens and ships is measurable under the treaty of 1846 by those of Colombian citizens and ships. It would be our earnest desire and expectation to see the world's peaceful commerce enjoy the same just, liberal, and rational treatment.

In the following letter of November 19, 1881, he lays down the policy of the United States almost exactly as it was worked out by the negotiators in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty now in existence. He lays it down to Great Britain, and this utterance of Secretary Blaine was the main expression of American policy which Mr. Hay, Mr. White, Mr. Choate, and Mr. Roosevelt found before them to follow in making this treaty. Let me read it:

In assuming as a necessity the political control of whatever canal or canals may be constructed across the Isthmus, the United States will act in entire harmony with the Governments within whose territory the canals shall be located. Between the United States and the other American Republics there can be no hostility, no jealousy, no rivalry, no distrust. This Government entertains no design in connection with this project for its own advantage which is not also for the equal or greater advantage of the country to be directly and immediately affected. Nor does the United States seek any exclusive or narrow commercial advantage. It frankly agrees and will by public proclamation declare at the proper time, in conjunction with the Republic on whose soil the canal may be located, that the same rights and privileges, the same tolls and obligations for the use of the canal, shall apply with absolute impartiality to the merchant marine of every nation on the globe. And equally in time of peace the harmless use of the canal shall be freely granted to the war vessels of other nations. In time of war, aside from the defensive use to be made of it by the country in which it is constructed and by the United States, the canal shall be impartially closed against the war vessels of all belligerents.

It is the desire and determination of the United States that the canal shall be used only for the development and increase of peaceful commerce among all the nations, and shall not be considered a strategic point in warfare which may tempt the aggression of belligerents or be seized under the compulsions of military necessity by any of the great powers that may have contests in which the United States has no stake and will take no part.

Mr. Blaine went out of office; other interests arose—the Venezuelan controversy with Great Britain, the progress of construction by the De Lesseps Co., which seemed for a time to bid fair to produce a canal across the Isthmus of Panama, the Spanish War, all intervened, and these negotiations languished and were intermitted until Mr. Hay, in 1898, reopened the subject with this declaration of Mr. Blaine, still standing, declaring what the United States would do if England would give to her the same sole control which she did give in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. How could the negotiators intend anything else in the words they used than that same large equality which the United States had thus already offered formally and solemnly?

In 1885, in his message of December 8, Mr. Cleveland says to Congress:

Whatever highway may be constructed across the barrier dividing the two greatest maritime areas of the world must be for the world's benefit—a trust for mankind, to be removed from the chance of domination by any single power, nor become a point of invitation for hostilities or a prize for warlike ambition.

In 1898 Mr. Hay, in reopening the negotiations which Mr. Blaine had begun, instructs Mr. White to say:

The President thinks it is more judicious to approach the British Government in a frank and friendly spirit of mutual accommodation, and to ask whether it may not be possible to secure such modification of the provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as to admit such action by the Government of the United States as may render possible the accomplishment of a work which will be for the benefit of the entire civilized world. The President hopes he may take it for granted that the British Government not only have no wish to prevent the accomplishment of this great work, but that they feel a lively interest in it and appreciate the fact that the benefits of its successful achievement will be to the advantage not only of England and America but of all commercial nations.

We know that the answer to that by Lord Salisbury was that he would be favorable to such a modification of the treaty relations provided that the vessels of all nations could use the canal on terms of equality.

In the year 1900, when the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty came before the Senate, the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, commonly spoken of as the Davis report, a very able, very thorough, very careful consideration of the whole subject, says:

It is not reasonable to suppose that Nicaragua and Costa Rica would grant to the United States the exclusive control of a canal through those States on terms less generous to the other maritime nations than those prescribed in the great act of October 22, 1888.

Referring to the Suez Canal convention—or if we could compel them to give us such advantages over other nations it would not be creditable to our country to accept them.

That our Government or our people will furnish the money to build the canal presents the single question whether it is profitable to do so. If the canal, as property, is worth more than its cost, we are not called on to divide the profits with other nations. If it is worth less and we are compelled by national necessities to build the canal, we have no right to call on other nations to make up the loss to us. In any view, it is a venture that we will enter upon if it is to our interest, and if it is otherwise we will withdraw from its further consideration.

The Suez Canal makes no discrimination in its tolls in favor of its stockholders; and, taking its profits or the half of them as our basis of calculation, we will never find it necessary to differentiate our rates of toll in favor of our own people in order to secure a very great profit on the investment.

In 1904, in the message of President Roosevelt, from which I have already read, submitting the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to the Senate, is the last authoritative and unmistakable declaration of the public service for all the world which the United States undertook in building the Panama Canal.

Now, Mr. President, the common law of England and America, the public policy especially of America at the very time this treaty was being negotiated, enforced with unsparing rigor the duty of equal charges and equal service by all public utilities to all the public which they were to serve, and in the face of this long series of public declarations by the Government of the United States committing itself to that relation, the relation of the builder and operator of a public utility for all the world, the makers of this treaty could not honorably have used words with any other meaning than the meaning of the large equality which they say they meant these words should have.

There is another reason. The kind of equality which the negotiators intended—that is, an equality in which the treatment of American citizens is made the standard for the treatment of foreign citizens—had during all the history of the Isthmian Canal efforts been the standard sought for in negotiations and treaties. That kind of equality was the standard adopted by the public policy of the United States for al. similar enterprises. It was customary; it was uniform; it was natural for negotiators of a treaty relating to a canal. Let me illustrate that by referring to the initial treaty on this subject, the treaty of New Granada of 1846. When the American negotiators making that treaty dealt with the subject of a railroad and canal, what kind of equality did they stipulate for? Why, this:

The Government of New Granada guarantees to the Government of the United States that the right of way or transit across the Isthmus of Panama upon any modes of communication that now exist, or that may be hereafter constructed, shall be open and free to the Government and citizens of the United States, and for the transportation of any articles of produce, manufactures, or merchandise of lawful commerce belonging to the citizens of the United States; that no other tolls or charges shall be levied or collected upon the citizens of the United States of their said merchandise thus passing over any road or canal that may be made by the Government of New Granada or by the authority of the same than is, under like circumstances, levied upon and collected from the Granadian citizens.

The message of President Polk transmitting this New Granada treaty of 1846 to Congress dwells especially upon the assurance to citizens of the United States of equal charges and equal f ilities in the use of railroad and canal with citizens of New Granada.

I go back again to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850. There is no doubt about the kind of equality which the negotiators considered it to be valuable to get, useful to get, natural to get.

Article 1 of that treaty provides that neither Government shall undertake any control or make any fortifications, make any effort "for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one, any rights or advantage in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other."

Article 5 provides that protection may be withdrawn if the company which builds the canal shall make "unfair discriminations in favor of the commerce of one of the contracting parties over the commerce of the other."

Article 6 uses as interchangeable terms the expression "on equal terms to all," and these provisions for measuring the rights of the citizens of one country by the rights accorded to the citizens of the other. They are used interchangeably.

Article 8 provides that—

It is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the canal shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable, and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State.

You will perceive, sir, that the terms on which citizens of other countries were to be allowed to come in were not terms of the most-favored nations as among themselves. They were on like terms with those which existed between Great Britain and the United States; that is to say, each other country which came in and adhered to this Clayton-Bulwer treaty was to have the rights of its citizens measured by the rights accorded to the citizens of the United States and to the citizens of Great Britain.

In our treaty with Great Britain in 1854, the reciprocity treaty of 1854—

It is agreed that the citizens and inhabitants of the United States shall have the right to navigate the River St. Lawrence, and the canals in Canada used as the means of communicating between the Great Lakes and the Atlantic Ocean, with their vessels, boats, and crafts, as fully and freely as the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, subject only to the same tolls and other assessments as now are, or may hereafter be, exacted of Her Majesty's said subjects.

* * * * * * *

It is further agreed that British subjects shall have the right freely to navigate Lake Michigan with their vessels, boats, and crafts so long as the privilege of navigating the River St. Lawrence, secured to American citizens by the above clause of the present article, shall continue; and the Government of the United States further engages to urge upon the State governments to secure to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty the use of the several State canals on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.

We made a treaty with Nicaragua in 1867, under which, then expecting the canal to be through Nicaraguan territory, it was provided that—

The Republic of Nicaragua hereby grants to the United States, and to their citizens and property, the right of transit between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans through the territory of that Republic, on any route of communication, natural or artificial, whether by land or by water, which may now or hereafter exist or be constructed under the authority of Nicaragua, to be used and enjoyed in the same manner and upon equal terms by both Republics and their respective citizens.

That treaty further provided:

And no higher or other charges or tolls shalls be imposed on the conveyance or transit of persons and property of citizens or subjects of the United States, or of any other country, across the said routes of communication, than are or may be imposed on the persons and property of citizens of Nicaragua.

In 1868 Mr. Seward made a treaty with Colombia, which was never ratified, in which the provision originally proposed by the United States was:

That the tariff of tolls and freights shall be on the basis of perfect equality for both nations and for all other nations who shall be at peace both with the United States of America and the United States of Colombia.

Colombia wished that provision to apply to both times of war and of peace; and accordingly it was modified and came into the completed treaty, which was submitted to the Senate in this form:

The Government of the United States of America shall establish a tariff of tolls and freights for the said canal on a basis of perfect equality for all nations, whether in time of peace or war.

In 1870 another treaty was made with Colombia, in which the provision was that the United States was to establish, just as it does here in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, a tariff of charges on merchant vessels and vessels of war upon the basis of perfect equality at all times among all nations, with no other distinctions than are contained in the preceding article.

In the preceding article the distinction is that the parties to the treaty—that is, Colombia and the United States—reserve to themselves the right of passing ships of war, troops, and munitions of war through the canal at all times free of charge of any description.

In 1871, in the great treaty of Washington of that year, we enlarged the stipulation regarding the use of American and Canadian canals, and the United States stipulated definitely that—

The subjects of Her Britannic Majesty shall enjoy the use of the St. Clair Flats Canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.

We have heard much discussion here of the controversy which arose between the United States and Great Britain over the application of that paragraph of the treaty of Washington giving equality to citizens of the two countries in the use both of American and Canadian canals. Several times the discussion has run into an attack upon the Canadian treatment of the subject, into a declaration that Canada did not yield gracefully or easily; that Canada did not yield until measures of retaliation were proposed. That is quite irrelevant to the bearing of this treaty and the discussion upon the question that is before us and upon the treatment of this subject by the makers of this treaty.

What position did we take? What was the attitude of the United States toward the subject of equality between the United States and Canada under this treaty stipulating for equality? That is the important question—not whether Great Britain was right or wrong; not whether Canada did right or wrong; not whether they were willing or unwilling; but what did the United States say and what position could the United States take consistently upon this subject of the equal use of the canals?

We are not left entirely to the treatment of canals for a guide as to the public policy of the United States. When this treaty was negotiated it had long been the general public policy of the United States to accord to all other nations in all ports and waters of the United States rights in respect of service and of charges, measured by the service and the charges to American citizens. The act of Congress of June 26, 1884, as amended June 19, 1886, reads:

Provided, That the President of the United States shall suspend the collection of so much of the duty herein imposed on vessels entered from any foreign port as may be in excess of the tonnage and light-house dues or other equivalent tax or taxes imposed in said port on American vessels by the Government of the foreign country in which such port is situated, and shall, upon the passage of this act, and from time to time thereafter, as often as it may become necessary by reason of changes in the laws of the foreign countries above mentioned, indicate, by proclamation, the ports to which such suspension shall apply, and the rate or rates of tonnage duty, if any, to be collected under such suspension: Provided further, That such proclamation shall exclude from the benefits of the suspension herein authorized the vessels of any foreign country in whose ports the fees or dues of any kind or nature imposed on vessels of the United States or the import or export duties on their cargoes are in excess of the fees, dues, or duties imposed on the vessels of the country in which such port is situated, or on the cargoes of such vessels.

I say that was the public policy of the United States regarding all ports and waters of the United States, and it was a policy toward all the world. A controversy arose about it. Canada claimed that we imposed excessive charges upon her vessels, and we claimed that she imposed excessive charges upon ours. A correspondence ensued, and on the 18th of February, 1896, Mr. Olney, then Secretary of State, wrote to Sir Julian Pauncefote as follows:

The understanding of the Government of the United States in the matter of the uniform treatment of foreign and domestic vessels is that charges on foreign vessels in the ports of the United States should be no higher than those imposed on vessels of the United States in the ports of this country, and that the charges imposed on American vesships in foreign ports should be no higher than the charges imposed on the vessels native to those ports. This is the practice of this Government, and it is in accord with nearly all of its treaties of commerce and navigation with foreign powers.

The fact cited in the Canadian minute that the charges of this Government on lake ports are larger than those imposed by the Dominion authorities will, upon more mature reflection, I am confident, be regarded as irrelevant, since those charges are imposed equally on American and foreign vessels.

On the 9th of June of the same year Sir Julian Pauncefote replied to Mr. Olney as follows:

SIR: With reference to my note of the 21st February last, and to previous correspondence respecting the alleged discrimination against United States vessels in Canadian ports on the Great Lakes, I have the honor to inform you that the Governor General of Canada has approved a minute of his privy council, recommending the revocation of the regulations complained of and the abolition of all fees hitherto exacted from vessels navigating inland waters when entering or clearing above Montreal.

That Sir Julian Pauncefote was the Lord Pauncefote who, with Mr. Hay and Mr. White, negotiated the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. We are asked to believe that starting with the Clayton-Bulwer convention, which gave to Great Britain unquestioned assurance of the larger and more valuable equality of her vessels with the vessels of American citizens, in a negotiation with a country which in all its history had insisted regarding all canals that the measure of equality should be the measure of service and of charges to its national citizens, in negotiating with a country which had just compelled him to yield that equality of treatment as a measure of general public policy, he abandoned the vantage ground of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and gave up that basis of equality without one word in the negotiation, without discussion, without its being asked, without its being mentioned, without his knowing it, without the other negotiators knowing it. But that is not all.

It was not merely the immemorial policy of the United States and Great Britain regarding all canals; it was not merely the general public policy of the United States and Great Britain regarding all ports and waters, but it was the policy of the United States regarding trade the world over, and the champion and protagonist of that policy was John Hay. At the very time that he was negotiating the Hay-Pauncefote treaty he was appealing to the justice of all the nations of the world for the "open door" in China; he was appealing to them in the interest of the world's commerce, in the interest of civilization to accord in all their possessions in China, what? Favored-nation treatment? Oh, no; the same treatment that they accorded to their own citizens. Let me ask you to attend for a moment to things that John Hay wrote regarding this great design, the accomplishment of which will ever stand in the history of diplomacy as one of the proudest contributions of America to the progress of civilization. On September 6, 1899, he wrote to Mr. Choate in London:

The Government of Her Britannic Majesty has declared that its policy and its very traditions precluded it from using any privileges which might be granted it in China as a weapon for excluding commercial rivals, and that freedom of trade for Great Britain in that Empire meant freedom of trade for all the world alike. While conceding by formal agreements, first with Germany and then with Russia, the possession of "spheres of influence or interest" in China, in which they are to enjoy special rights and privileges, more especially in respect of railroads and mining enterprises, Her Britannic Majesty's Government has therefore sought to maintain at the same time what is called the "open-door policy" to insure to the commerce of the world in China equality of treatment within said "spheres" for commerce and navigation.

He wrote to Ambassador White in Germany September 6, the same date:

Earnestly desirous to remove any cause of irritation and to insure at the same time to the commerce of all nations in China the undoubted benefits which should accrue from a formal recognition by the various powers claiming "spheres of interest" that they shall enjoy perfect equality of treatment for their commerce and navigation within such "spheres" the Government of the United States would be pleased to see His German Majesty's Government give formal assurances and lend its cooperation in securing like assurances from the other interested powers that each within its respective sphere of whatever influence. * * *

Third. That it will levy no higher harbor dues on vessels of another nationality frequenting any port in such "sphere" than shall be levied on vessels of its own nationality, and no higher railroad charges over lines built, controlled, or operated within its "sphere" on merchandise belonging to citizens or subjects of other nationalities transported through such "sphere" than shall be levied on similar merchandise belonging to its own nationals transported over equal distances.

So he wrote all of the great nations of the world an appeal for equal treatment, an appeal for a specific stipulation to secure the equal treatment that no higher charges should be imposed upon the citizens of any other country in the ports and waters possessed by those great powers in China or for freight or passage over the railroads built and controlled by them than were imposed upon their own citizens. To that appeal all the great powers of the world responded in affirmance; and on the 20th of March, 1900, Mr. Hay was able to issue his circular of instructions to all the ambassadors and ministers of the United States announcing the universal assent of the world to that great principle of equality—equality measured by the rights of the citizens of the nation granting it in all the Empire of China; yet we are asked to believe that John Hay denied, abjured, repudiated that policy of civilization in regard to the Panama Canal at the very moment that, through the same agents, he was enforcing the policy upon the same countries; and that he did it without knowing it, as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] suggests.

But, Mr. President, we are not left to inferences which must be drawn from the circumstances that I have mentioned or from declarations of public policy or from the uniform course and custom of treaty making regarding canals and regarding public waters and transportation. There is positive, and it appears to me conclusive, affirmative evidence that the negotiators did effectively proceed in making this treaty in accordance with the honorable obligation of their country as the builder and maintainer of a public utility, as the champion of equal commercial rights the world over.

We begin the consideration of the express provisions leading to the conclusion that the larger equality was intended with the communication of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to the Senate. Of course, we are all familiar with the terms of the preamble preserving the general principle of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Let me read them again, however, for convenience of reference:

The United States of America and His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British dominions beyond the seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries.

Now we are told that the language of a treaty or of a contract or of a statute can not be changed by the preamble; but what is the purpose of a preamble? The purpose is to afford a guide to the interpretation of the terms of the treaty or of the statute. When you start with the third article of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and have a debate as to its interpretation you turn to the preamble and you find there a guide intended by the makers of the treaty to enable you to reach the right interpretation upon the terms of the third article. But, still further than that, the idea of not impairing the general principle of neutralization is carried into the treaty itself, for in article 4—

It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

That is, repeating in the fourth article as being a part of the treaty itself the words of the preamble that the obstacles of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty are to be removed without impairing the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention.

This preamble, sir, which refers to the general principle of neutralization in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and which manifestly is designed to preserve in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty something of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, has been treated in discussion as being a matter of not very much importance. Not so the view of the negotiators of the treaty. Not so the view of anybody connected with our Government at the time the treaty was made, for you will perceive, in the first place, that in the letters of transmittal of the treaty special pains are taken to have it understood that this treaty preserves unimpaired something which is called the general principle of neutralization.

Mr. Hay, in transmitting the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to the President, writes:

I submit for your consideration * * * a convention * * * to remove any objection which may arise out of the * * * Clayton-Bulwer treaty * * * without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention.

President Roosevelt, in transmitting the treaty to the Senate, says:

I transmit, for the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification, a convention signed November 18, 1901, * * * to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of April 19, 1850, * * * to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention.

That feature of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is dwelt upon and made extraordinarily prominent, and there is a manifest feeling that the Senate ought not to lose sight of it in considering whether it shall advise the ratification of the treaty.

We are not left to that, however. When the treaty negotiations were nearly completed Mr. Hay wrote to Lord Pauncefote September 2, 1901, regarding the last treaty as compared with the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which failed of ratification. He said:

I considered the adoption by the Senate without change of the preamble of our former treaty—

That is, the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty—

by which it was declared that the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention was not impaired thereby, a fortunate circumstance, as it enabled us in passing a new draft to retain the important utterance in the preamble in the same form to which the Senate had already given its assent.

Not only did Mr. Hay regard that as important, but the British negotiators regarded it as highly important. On the 25th of September, 1901, Mr. Choate wrote to Mr. Hay as follows:

On Monday, the 23d, I had an interview with Lord Pauncefote and tried, as I had before, to persuade him that it was neither wise nor necessary to mar your article 4 by the addition proposed in my cable to you. But he thought, as he did before, and more strongly than he did before, that with the addition Parliament and the British press and public could be made to accept the treaty, but that without it they could not.

Referring to article 4 as it now appears in the print—

He thought it very necessary that they should be able to say very emphatically that although they had abrogated the Clayton-Bulwer treaty they had preserved the principle of it.

What was that principle? We have to turn to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty again. The principle of neutralization in the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is to be preserved unimpaired, according to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; and it is regarded by the negotiators upon both sides as a matter of great importance. Special attention is called to it when the treaty is submitted to the Senate. Now, let me go over again the provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

In the first article there is an agreement not to take advantage of any alliance or any connection of either Government on the Isthmus—for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other.

No discriminations are to be made in favor of the commerce of the one against the commerce of the other. The great design of the convention is said to be, in article 6—

That of constructing and maintaining the said canal as a ship communication between the two oceans for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all, and of protecting the same.

In the eighth article it is provided:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

What is the principle of neutralization contained in that article? The negotiators understood that there was such a principle in that article, for they say:

Without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention.

The only two things in article 8 are the equality of service and of charge between the vessels of the United States and those of Great Britain and the extension of that to other countries that come in and the obligation of protection. The great object of the negotiation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was to take over to the United States alone the duty and the right of protection. That was the difference between the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—that Great Britain was to surrender the right of protection, to be relieved from the duty of protection, and no other countries were to be permitted to come in and exercise the right of protection. The United States was to put itself on the platform that Blaine laid down in 1881, as the sole protector of the canal. What, then, was there to be preserved unimpaired in the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty? Nothing except the basis of equality; equality between the United States and Great Britain, equality measured by the treatment of the nationals of one country for the nationals of the other. Nothing else was left to be preserved unimpaired.

Observe that the term used by the preamble and by the fourth article of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is not "neutrality," but "neutralization." They are both well-understood and well-defined terms. By all writers upon international law, in all the literature of international law, the distinction is well understood. Neutralization is the contractual arrangement which produces neutrality. The end to be attained is neutrality. The means by which it is obtained is neutralization.

Now, let us go back to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The only thing in the eighth article that was not expressly and intentionally destroyed was the equality stipulated in the eighth article, stipulated in the fifth article and the sixth article and the first article, and carried into the eighth article by reference. That equality was the principle upon which this canal was to be made neutral. There is no other meaning that you can find for it, and that is what was to be preserved unimpaired.

There is no need of speculating about it. Fortunately, we are told by the negotiators themselves what they meant. I read from a letter of Mr. Choate to Mr. Hay, dated August 20, 1901, when this negotiation had far progressed and this second treaty was in form, and there was nothing at all left to be discussed which affected the subject. When I read these words I want you to remember that you must construe the equality provision of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty as being the very equality established in the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, unless you can find some other meaning in the minds of the makers of this treaty.

Now let me read what Mr. Choate said:

As article 8 stands in the C.-B. treaty—

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty—

it undoubtedly contemplates further treaty stipulations—not "these" treaty stipulations, in case any other interoceanic route, either by land or by water, should "prove to be practicable," and it proceeds to state what the general principle to be applied is to be, viz, no other charges or conditions of traffic thereon "than are just and equitable," and that said "canals or railways" being open to the subjects and citizens of Great Britain and the United States on equal terms shall also be open on like terms to the subjects and citizens of other States, which I believe to be the real general principle of neutralization (if you choose to call it so) intended to be asserted by this eighth article of the C.-B. treaty.

That is from Mr. Choate to Mr. Hay. That is from the man who put those words into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty for us to the man who authorized the signing of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty for us, and that is what he meant. That is what he said over his official signature he meant by preserving unimpaired in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the general principle of neutralization established in the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and no power of reasoning or of sophistry can justify the American Government in putting upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty any other meaning than the meaning there declared.

The negotiators on the other side thought the same thing about it. Mr. Choate, on September 21, reports to Mr. Hay a conversation he had had with Lord Pauncefote. He says:

He again insisted, as Lord Lansdowne had insisted, that they must have something to satisfy Parliament and the British public that in giving up the Clayton-Bulwer treaty they had retained and reasserted the "general principle" of it, that the canal should be technically neutral and should be free to all nations on terms of equality, and especially that in the contingency supposed, of the territory on both sides of the canal becoming ours, the canal, its neutrality, its being free and open to all nations on equal terms should not be thereby affected.

There you perceive that Lord Pauncefote's paraphrase of the terms of the eighth section of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is—

Should be free to all nations on terms of equality.

It is the provision for equality in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty which he regarded as the general principle established in the eighth article.

Let me read it again:

They must have something to satisfy Parliament and the British public that in giving up the Clayton-Bulwer treaty they had retained and reasserted the "general principle" of it, that the canal should be technically neutral and should be free to all nations on terms of equality.

What that equality was, you find in the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Mr. Hay, in his letter to Senator Cullom at the time the treaty was under consideration by the Senate, says:

He (the President) not only was willing but earnestly desired that the "general principle" of neutralization referred to in the preamble of this treaty and in the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty should be perpetually applied to this canal. This, in fact, had always been insisted upon by the United States.

There was no change in policy.

He recognized the entire justice and propriety of the demand of Great Britain that if she was asked to surrender the material interest secured by the first article of that treaty, which might result at some indefinite future time in a change of sovereignty in the territory traversed by the canal, the "general principle" of neutralization as applied to the canal should be absolutely secured.

Whatever else the Hay-Pauncefote treaty means, it means to secure absolutely the general principle of neutralization contained in the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which was, according to the understanding of the makers of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the absolute equality of the ships, the citizens and the subjects of all nations with the ships and the citizens of the United States and of Great Britain; and we are not at liberty to spell out any different meaning of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

In the face of these declarations we are asked to find a meaning of this treaty which ascribes to Great Britain the intent to abandon everything there was in the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. We are asked, in the face of Mr. Choate's declarations to Mr. Hay, and Mr. Hay's to the President and to the Senate, to ascribe to this treaty an intention to take away from Great Britain everything there was left of equality in the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; and we are asked to suppose that that was done without its being mentioned in the negotiations, without one word, without our asking it of Great Britain or Great Britain offering it to us, without its being discussed, without its being proposed or broached in any way.
